"I think I ought to know that," said Jane, the tears coming to her eyes as she remembered the unvarying goodness she had received ever since she had known her first, and wondering if it would be extended to her now if all were discovered. But Mr. Knollys, who disliked anything approaching to enthusiasm, only coughed.

"I am glad I overtook you, Mr. Knollys," continued Jane, excitedly, as he did not respond. "I wanted to say something about—about what we were talking of the other day."

Again the gold-rimmed glasses were brought to bear upon the girl's white, pained face.

"I shall be glad to hear anything that will throw any further light upon that mysterious murder," he answered, looking at her keenly.

"I have nothing to tell you about that," was the reply given in a low voice; "I only wanted to assure you that the suspicion, which I believe you shared with me when I spoke to you last, is entirely without foundation. I don't know how we could have thought it."

"Humph!" ejaculated Mr. Knollys.

"You don't believe me?"

"My dear lady, I have no reason to doubt your word, only you must allow me to have my own opinions without reference to yours. That we at any time suspected the same person of the crime is a surmise on your part, and no certainty. Of this much I may positively inform you—thought doubtless it is indiscreet to hit at a denouement to a lady—the murderer of Trooper Lynn will not remain much longer at large, unless—which is not likely—I have made a great mistake."

"Have I any reason to be afraid?" she ventured, tremulously.

"That, my dear Miss Knox, is a question you must ask yourself. Ah, this is Mrs. Dene's, and our conversation is at an end."

"Will you forgive me for coming back, Mrs. Dene? Will you let me stay with you a little longer?" she begged, her lovely hazel eyes, by the intensity of their gaze, betraying that there was more than at first sight appeared in the simple entreaty.

And Nora Dene, who was nothing if not sympathetic, and never marred a graceful act by awkward questions or conditions, folded her tenderly in her arms.

"You may stay with me always, if you like," she replied.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

It was two days after the receipt of Jane's letter that Barry Larron presented himself at the bungalow where she was staying and asked if she were in. The reply was in the affirmative.

A few moments later Jane stood before him, and he forgot all things mundane in the presence of the one pure influence of his life.

Now as she stood before him, her face turned away, her small fingers nervously interlaced, he determined to strain every nerve to win her. The mere dread of losing her seemed more than he could bear. What would the reality be? He controlled his agitation by an effort, and his voice was quite calm, though full of feeling when at last he spoke.

"Will you forgive me that I wished to hear my fate from your own lips?" he asked.

"I still think," she answered, "it is needless pain to both."

"Is there nothing—nothing I can say to move you?"

She shook her head; and something in the gesture, which was full of determination, sent back his thoughts to the time when he had known her first, a little, shy, unformed girl, who surely then could not have had the audacity to refuse a man in his position. Why had he temporized and delayed so long?

"Jane," he said, suddenly, "are you happy?"

"Do I look so?" she counter-questioned, bitterly, turning a piteous, tear-stained face to him.

"Miss Knox, for some time I have thought it was my duty to make public the suspicions you expressed to me once as to Colonel Prinsep's complicity, if not actual guilt, in the murder of Trooper Lynn," he observed, slowly, watching with almost diabolical delight each change in her expression. "It was regard for you alone that induced me to keep your secret hitherto; but you cannot expect that to influence me now."

"I did not expect it."

He had waited so pointedly for her to speak that she was obliged to answer, though scarcely conscious of what she said. She knew Stephen Prinsep to be guiltless; but others had not the knowledge that she possessed. Circumstantial evidence would be strong against him. Could he prove his innocence? Could she prove it for him, without betraying her father? Must the horrible choice be thrust upon her of parent or lover? An inquiry must inevitably bring so much to light that was hidden now.

"For your sake, I would keep it secret still," whispered Barry Larron, in her ear.

"You would? Oh——"

Again her speech was stayed as she met his glance. It was impossible to connect either sympathy or pity with the hard, steadfast gaze that rested on her.

"I ought to have said 'my wife's sake,' to make my meaning clear. The fate of more than one depends on your reply. Come to me your own, now, with honest in your heart as I have read it in your eyes to-day, and I will be grateful for the half loaf which is better than no bread. My wife, I promise you, shall have no cause for sorrow!"

But Jane only shivered and turned away. She could not even consider the advisability of what he had urged, so great was the repulsion engendered by his words and manner. To vow to love and honor a man toward whom she felt like that would be a positive wrong which nothing could make right.

"If that is the condition, you must do your worst. I have no fear but that Colonel Prinsep can fight his own battle, even against such determined malice," she replied, bravely, and turned to leave the room.

"You defy me?" he asked, intercepting her, and looking down meaningly into her face.

She returned his gaze without flinching. Whatever fear she felt must not be betrayed to him.

"I do. Allow me to pass, Major Larron."

A moment he hesitated. He felt that this would be the last interview with her; that he had played, and lost—not only his stake, but even the poor friendliness that had been his before. And he loved her so! The temptation assailed him to at least taste all the wild sweetness that farewell might be. He had never kissed her—scarcely even clasped her hand with more than ordinary ferver, and she was going from him now forever! Perhaps it was her pure, pale face, which with all its winning prettiness was proud too, that restrained him; or, perhaps, he loved her better than he himself knew; at any rate, he drew back politely—almost reverently—to let her pass, and she did not even guess what madness had been in his thoughts.

She sped back to her own room, and found Mrs. Dene waiting for her there, seated on the edge of the bed reading the newspaper.

"Well, dear?" she said, looking up, smiling. "Is the 'bad quarter of an hour' over?"

"Thank heaven—yes. Oh, Nora, he is a very wicked man!"

"Perhaps you have not quite understood him, Jenny?"

"Only too well, I am afraid."

But the elder woman, who, without knowing it, felt a tender pity still for her former lover, whom yet she neither loved nor regretted, shook her head.

"He was never so black as painted—not even so black as I fancy he believes himself to be. If you could have cared for him sufficiently to marry him, I believe he would have proved the best of husbands."

"Oh, Nora, I never, never could! Please say no more about it. Is that to-day's paper? Is there any news?"

"Not much. Except—yes, this may interest you—they are moving for a fresh inquiry into the murder of Trooper Lynn. I thought it would come to that. Well, anything is better than all those hints and innuendos that they have been writing lately. Now the whole truth will come out, the murderer will be discovered, and—why, what is it, Jenny?"

For Jane had fallen forward upon the bed in a paroxysm of grief.

For the first time since the fresh inquiry was mooted, Mrs. Dene allowed herself to believe that there might be something in the rumors which had gone about. She could not but suspect that there was a little truth in the statement that the Quartermaster's daughter knew something of the circumstances of the man's death; if not, why should she have been so agitated on hearing there was to be a new inquiry?

CHAPTER XXXIX.

The announcement in the Indian Argus which had so startled Jane had also proved very disconcerting to the Deputy Commissioner himself. He had thought that he was working so quietly, and yet already it had leaked out that he was working, which to a great extent must restrict, or might even render futile his efforts. Yet who could have so made public the intentions which he had purposely kept secret, only speaking of them to his thanedar and Jane Knox? That the latter would not have spoken of it he felt convinced. She was too deeply concerned in the matter to talk of it at random or lightly.

One other person, beside him to whom that paragraph must have held such terrible import, was seriously disturbed by it; and that was Stephen Prinsep. He knew that Jane possessed some knowledge on the subject, and that it was this knowledge which had altered her so, and destroyed his hopes of winning her, for awhile at least.

Curiously enough he resolved to call on Mrs. Dene, and get her to persuade Jane to see him.

But after all this proved an unnecessary precaution, for when he followed his card, it was Jane herself who came in a moment afterward, her face flushed with the haste she had made to join him.

"Mrs. Dene is out, but she will be back again almost directly, I think," she exclaimed, hurriedly. "And, oh, Colonel Prinsep, I have so wished to see you!"

"Then I am very glad I came. Somehow I fancied you were wanting me," he answered, holding her hand in a firm yet gentle clasp.

"But you will never guess why."

"Are you quite sure I do not know?"

"Oh, I hope not—I hope not!" she exclaimed, earnestly. "I think I must have been quite mad when I—I believed——"

"What, child—what?"

"That you had killed Jacob Lynn."

The words were out; but, now that she heard her own voice express aloud what for so long she had only whispered fearfully to her heart, its whole enormity rose before her, and she wondered how for a moment she could have thought it possible. She fell upon her knees, her hand still held in his, the tears streaming from her eyes.

"Oh, can you ever forgive me, Stephen?"

"What is there I could not forgive you, Jenny?" he said, softly, in the low, caressing tones which, though strange to her so long, held still their powerful charm.

"Tell me why you suspected me?" he asked, gently, drawing two chairs to the fire, and seating himself so naturally in one that she could not well refuse to take the other.

And then she told him as much of the story as she could, though the evidence she had once believed condematory seemed miserably weak, told thus to his face.

"I did not always believe it," she finished, apologetically—"often the suspicions seemed as ridiculous and unfounded as I know them to be now, and then—then——"

He waited quietly for her to continue, looking straight into the fire, not at her downcast face.

"I could not bear the uncertainty any longer. I wanted to prove it one way or the other, and to do so I went to your bungalow, when you were away, and searched——"

"I know it, Jenny; I was there. I saw you!"

An ejaculation of dismay escaped her lips, and she covered her face with her hands to hide its burning crimson. She felt so ashamed, as though she could never meet his eyes again. What, oh, what must he have thought?"

"Don't be sorry about it, darling. You would not be if you knew the comfort it has been all this time to be sure that you loved me still, impossible as it must otherwise have seemed in the face of your determined coldness."

"You saw me at the writing-table?" she faltered.

"I saw you kiss what I had written underneath your photograph, and since then it has been a hundred times more dear," he concluded, warmly. "There was so much I could not understand in your behavior at that time; but that one all-important fact at least was clear—you loved me. That was all I cared to know. You wouldn't wish to rob me of that knowledge, Jenny? Lift up your face, darling; don't look so ashamed."

He was standing beside her chair now, his hand resting on her shoulder; and she looked up into his face.

"I ought not to be ashamed of that, Stephen—not of loving you, I mean, but——"

"All the rest is blotted out, forgotten!" he declared.

"But——" she repeated, nervously.

"Don't say anything to spoil it, dear. Let us talk of something else. You never spoke to any one else of your suspicions, did you?"

"Yes; Mr. Knollys asked me a great many questions some time ago, and I am afraid he gathered something from my answers which made him think what I thought then. But directly I knew that you were innocent, I told him so, only I am not sure that he believed me—not quite sure, at least."

"Never mind. Let him believe what he likes. Perhaps it may keep him off the right track." Then, meeting Jane's surprised, confused glance, he added quickly: "Tell me how you discovered it was not I."

"Don't ask me," said Jane, in a low, pained voice. "It is all too terrible—too sad!

POWER OF THE BRAIN.

Do Men and Women Ever Really Forget Anything?

The brain of mankind has been defined as a kind of phonographic cylinder, which retains impressions made upon it through the medium of the senses, particularly through the eyes and ears. If this be true memory must depend for its intensity or retentive qualities upon the degree of observation with which the record is made.

Nor is this all. If memory's record is kept in the shape of indentations upon the folds of brain matter, are they ever entirely effaced? In other words, do we really ever forget anything? May it not be that the inner depths of the brain memory has stored up recollections of things which are never again purposely turned to, perhaps, but which instantly spring into being and flash through the mind whenever we hear or see something which recalls them?

There are several well-known mental phenomena which strengthen this theory. We know that memory often brightens during the last moments of life and there are cases on record where Germans, French, Spaniards and others who, falling ill in this country years after having entirely forgotten their native languages, recovered and used them upon their death-beds.

There is a theory that in all such cases the brain folds have relaxed, just as do the muscles and cords of the limbs and body, and that by so doing they expose to the mind's monitor indentations (recollections) which were long since folded up and put away as material that could not be of any particular use.—Family Doctor.

Hoop-Hunting.

Mr. James Payn lived as a boy among the Berkshire downs of England. "A marvellous expanse of springy turf," he calls them, "blown over by the most delicious airs and, though treeless, not without a certain wild beauty." Here one of the best of his juvenile sports was "hoop-hunting," a sport of which few readers are likely to have had any considerable experience.

All that was requisite to enjoy this pastime was a high wind. We took our hoops, half a dozen of them sometimes, to the top of the first hill, and started them; then, after one minute's "law"—more correctly grace—we followed them. But we never caught them save by misadventure.

Their speed was incredible, and far surpassed that of any bicycle. Down one hill and up another they went, apparently at the same rate; and when any obstacle, such as a road with high banks, intervened, they surmounted it with deer-like leaps and bounds.

A more graceful sight could hardly be imagined. I have known a hoop to run five miles, and to stop only because it arrived at a "bottom"—the limit of the downs in that direction. It would have needed a race-horse to overtake them. We got the hoops from a brewery owned by an uncle of mine, and whenever the smell of brewing comes to my nostrils, I am, for half a minute, a boy again, capless, careless, with my foot on the turf and the mild west wind in my hair.

Figures in the Calendar.

The figure 9 which came into the calendar on Jan. 1, 1889, will stay with us 111 years from that date, or until Dec. 31, 1999. No other figure has ever had such a long consecutive run, and the 9 itself has only once before been in a race which lasted over a century—that in which it continuously figured from Jan 1, 889, until Dec. 31, 989, a period of 111 years. The figures 3 and 7 occasionally fall into odd combinations, but neither of them has ever yet served for a longer period than 100 consecutive years in our calendar since the present mode of calculating time was established. It is also clear that from their relative positions among the numerals it is an impossibility for either of them to appear in date reckonings continuously for a longer period than a century.

"Wearing of the Green" exists in several forms and versions. The one best known in this country was written by Dion Boucicault. It is sung by "Shaun the Post" in the play "Arrah na Pogue."

There is a girl in Maine who has the sleeping habit the worst way. She often sleeps twenty-three hours out of the twenty-four.

Adventurers resting for power,
No men ever fought more like heroes,
From Marathon down to this hour.

Two score and more hours were they marching,
Two days without food or repose,
Through noons when the scorching sun burned them,
Through nights when the blood almost froze.

Half famished at last and beleagured,
About them all fierce iron hail
From sharpshooters lying in ambush,
They fall like the grain 'neath the flail.

Outnumbered, too—ten men to one man—
They fought there like demons at bay,
With nothing to shoot at but smoke puffs,
Behind which the enemy lay.

'Oh, where is the help from the Rand, boys?
Oh, where is the succor of friends?

Freebooters and robbers we call them,
Those six hundred bold buccaneers
Jim Jameson led into Boerland
To sow it with war and with tears.

Freebooters and robbers they may be,
Our curses on false-hearted traitors."
Jim's cry with the bullet's "ping" blends.

Then up went the flag of surrender,
'Twas only an old shirt at best.
To fight was to stand and be slaughtered,
They'd gamble with fate for the rest.

"Our lives will you spare us?" asked Jim then.
Thus answered the chief of the Boers:
"The lives of the men will be spared them.
Not so, rash invader, with yours."

"Then never mind me, boys," bold Jim cried;
"Surrender and save your own lives."
Then broke these rough men into weeping.
So lightning the giant oak rives.

Freebooters and robbers we call them,
Those six hundred bold buccaneers,
But Jameson's brave deed that morning
Will live down the cycles of years.

MANY LONG JOURNEYS.

Remarkable Travels of a Letter to a Sailor from His Sweetheart.

If any man doubts that the postal authorities do their best to deliver letters under difficulties let him examine the accompanying photograph of the front and back of an envelope which has traveled four times across the Atlantic, took a trip down the Mediterranean, and made several long journeys in the United States before it overtook the one to whom it was addressed. This letter is believed to have broken all records for distance traveled, number of times readdressed, and minimum amount of postage paid. It started out on a two-cent stamp and ended its journey free from debts in the way of "postage due."

To make the story more interesting the letter was from a sailor to his sweetheart. It started out from New Bedford, Mass., bright and early on Decoration Day, the postmark being "6:30 a. m." It was addressed to "Mr. Reo Bennett, Charlestown, Mass." Mr. Bennett was a cadet on the United States warship Enterprise. The letter reached Charlestown, May 31, as shown by the postmark. Bennett had gone, so the missive was forwarded to Trafalgar Square, London, England, in care of B. F. Stevens, United States dispatch agent. The London postmark is dated June 8. From here it was forwarded down the Mediterranean to Tangier, Morocco. Tangier was reached June 17. It was addressed in care of the United States Consulate. The Consul, in the absence of positive information, thought it would be a safe guess to send that letter back to Boston. The second trip across the Atlantic was made in good time. From here it was sent to the starting point, New Bedford, reaching that point some time in September, the date not being on the envelope. Taking a fresh start, it was sent back across the Atlantic, this time to Malaga, Spain. From here it traveled back again to Charlestown navy-yard, thence to Boston, being addressed to No. 42 West Newton street.

By this time the face of the envelope was so thoroughly covered with addresses and stamps, to say nothing of postmarks, that there was no space left. The back was also covered with two or three layers of postmarks. At the last Boston address some one thought of trying Chicago, so the final address was written over a lot of postmarks on the back, "1336 Monadnock Bldg., Chicago." This is the office address of Reo's father, who is the Western manager of the Street Railway Journal. Reo happened to be in the city on a visit to his parents, and the letter was at last delivered.

INSECT LOOKS LIKE A STICK.

Its Appearance Enables It to Escape Manifold Dangers.

Unique among the insect creation are the stick insects, which have the peculiar gift of making people believe that they are inanimate objects. This insect, according to the New York World, is commonly met with in the high, dry, yellow grass of Nyassaland, in South Africa. When it is in repose, with its legs stretched closely against its back, it is difficult to believe that it is not a dry twig. It is necessary to touch it in order to find that it is alive. The insects smaller and weaker than itself which do this are eaten as a reward for their inquiring spirit.

The twig insect undoubtedly lives by its shape, which helps to provide it with food at a minimum of exertion. It enables it to escape from all sorts of dangers. Other animals with a taste for insect food seldom detect it owing to its twig-like appearance. Moreover, it is hardly worth their while to trouble about such an elusive animal. But no animal seems born to enjoy this life without worries and enemies. It appears that there is a curious and large toad that makes a specialty of finding twig insects. This toad would rather hunt twig insects than eat the juiciest and most easily caught green flies. Many of them are very large. Some South American ones are four inches in length. They are usually very pugnacious, fighting much among themselves. A fight usually ends in one of the combatants losing his head. The victor eats the remains.

The Grunt of the Pig.

The continual grunting of the pig is of interest as revealing something of the conditions of life of his wild ancestors. A herd of swine scattered in the long grass or among the brackens of a European forest would soon lose sight of one another. But the grunts of each would still advertise his presence to his neighbors, and so the individual members of the herd would not lose touch with the main body. Then there are grunts and grunts. If one of my readers will imitate the ingenious Mr. Garner and take a phonograph to the nearest pigsty he might get material to make up a book on the language and grammar of the hog. However thick the jungle, the wild pig could, by taking note of the pitch and emphasis of the grunts to right and left of him, tell pretty much what his hidden colleagues were thinking about.—North American Review.

WHEREIN KWAKIUTLS EXCEL.

Their Heads Are Very Respectable Cone-shaped Affairs.

The Kwakiutls are among the most interesting of the aboriginal races on this continent. They live at Fort Rupert, on the extreme northern point of Vancouver Island. The Kwakiutls are a distinct branch, and allied to no other Indians in the country. Their language is a very peculiar one, and very difficult to understand. They live by fishing, and their camp is many miles away from the more settled districts of the island. White men very rarely visit their settlement.

They are very conservative, and preserve all their old traditions and religious beliefs, which they have possessed for perhaps thousands of years. No missionary has ever been able to make the slightest impression upon them, and now they leave them severely alone. Money is unknown among them, and blankets are used as currency. When the seal spearers are paid in coin by the captains of schooners, they immediately travel to the nearest supply station and exchange the money for blankets.

Marriages among them are arranged on the purchase system. A wife is worth so many blankets, according to the position of her father. The head man of the village impersonates the supreme spirit or deity at the annual festivals. All the other leading tribesmen represent a god, according to their position. Every man is extremely anxious to act the part of a god, but he can only do so by marrying the eldest daughter of a man who holds the office which he desires to fill. Those girls, are, therefore, most desirable whose fathers hold the highest religious offices.

A very curious fashion obtains among this remarkable tribe. Soon after a child is born its head is tightly wrapped in bandages, which compress it toward the top. These bandages are kept on until the bones of the skull are permanently shaped and the head becomes of the form of a sugar loaf. The more pointed and elongated the top of the head, the more beautiful and fashionable is the proud owner regarded. This strange distortion does not seem to affect them, either mentally or physically.

BLAINE'S SON-IN-LAW.

Coppinger, After Much Opposition, Is at Last a Brigadier General.

John J. Coppinger, who was the cause of the break in the friendship between Gen. Harrison and James G. Blaine, has finally won the point upon which the two statesmen split. He is now a general. This honor was asked by Mrs. Blaine, she being interested because Coppinger had married her daughter. Gen. Harrison, as President, refused to make the appointment, as the promotion would jump him over the heads of older men in the service, who deserved the rank equally as much. Mrs. Blaine was piqued, and within a few days the candidacy of Mr. Blaine for the Presidency was announced.

His nomination was sent to the Senate not long ago, and the body confirmed him a brigadier after a long discussion. The opposition came this time from Senators Burrows, Gear, Perkins, Teller, Pettigrew, Squire and Wilson. Gen. Coppinger entered the service as captain of the Fourteenth Infantry, after his education at West Point. He went to Rome in 1860 and was made a chevalier for gallant work in the defense of La Rocca gateway by the Papal army. He came back to the United States as soon as war was declared and did gallant duty at Appomattox. He was promoted and came out of the conflict as a colonel. His recommendation for generalship by President Cleveland caused surprise, but the Senate confirmed the nomination by a vote of 44 to 17. He was born in Ireland.

His Authority.

Col. T. A. Dodge is responsible for the following story of a negro preacher whose congregation habitually made a great racket every Sunday. Upon being questioned, the old man, with evident sorrow for the ignorance of the Colonel, said:

"Doan' you know the Lord's prayer?"

"Of course," replied the Colonel; "but what has that to do with it?"

"Doan' de Lawd's prayer say hollered be Thy name?" replied the all-wise preacher.

Political Announcements

EDITOR COURIER:—

You will please announce my name as a candidate for Congress from the 12th Congressional District, subject to the Democratic nominating convention to be held at Kendallville, April 7th 1896.

JAMES M. ROBINSON.

Fort Wayne, Ind.

CONGRESSIONAL CONVENTION.

At a meeting composed of the chairmen of the Democratic Central Committees of the several counties of the Twelfth Congressional District and the district committeemen, held at Fort Wayne on the 8th day of January, 1896, it was determined that the convention for the nomination of a democratic candidate for Congress, to represent the district, would be held at the Opera House in the city of Kendallville on at 2 o'clock p. m. All delegates hereto fore elected, or such as may be hereafter elected to said convention are requested to take notice and be present at the convention at the time and place above stated, without further notification. Democrats generally are invited to be present. The representation for the several counties is as follows, and is based upon one delegate for each one hundred and fractions of fifty votes and over cast for Claude Matthews for Governor in 1896.

SHAWNEE MILLS.

This township was called up Saturday before the county commissioners who held a special session for that purpose. About 100 men are up from St. Joe and Spencerville, being interested on one side or the other. The session began at 2 o'clock in the court room. James H. Rose, as county attorney sits near the Board to help them to points of law in case of need. Judge McClellan is attorney for the petitioners, and Roby Link and Emanuel for the remonstrants. To-day they agreed that each side should only have five witnesses on the point now at issue, viz, to see whether the gravel road wolud be a benefit. It is going on to-day, and if only the five witnesses have to be examined it may take all week. The regular March session of the Board will begin next Monday.

Institute

Smithfield and Franklin teachers held their joint institute at Pleasant Hill Saturday having the work of the Sixth Institute. Supt. Merica called the meeting to order and C. P. Hamman was made chairman and after a few words by him, institute proceeded with its work. After a song, "Methods" was given by Charles McMurray, followed by discussion by Isaac Barker and John Louisheiser. "Grammar" was given by Eugene Betz, followed by Hattie Firestone and a general discussion led by Aida Bemenderfer.

At the afternoon session which began with a song, "Studies in Shakespeare" was taken up and discussed. It was opened by Mr. Fisk and he was followed by Albert Shultz, Bertha Beard and Bell Cooper. "History" was opened by T. J. Baxter and he was followed by O. S. Benjamin and C. P. Hamman. "State Constitution" was discussed by Bertha Sattison and A. M. Kiplinger, Supt. Merica gave an excellent talk on school work. The two trustees, Mr. Jacman of Smithfield and Mr. Brown of Franklin, were present and well pleased with the work their teachers had done so far. Miss Amanda Myers and Miss Mamie furnished excellent music. About forty visitors were present. They are always welcome.

ANAHEIM, Cal. Feb. 13, 96.

EDITOR COURIER:

The Mercury for the week past has been about 90 degrees and above in this section of the west, the roads in this country are the wheelmen's delight. Daily we see hundreds of them passing by, many of them touring the country. Just now there are some fine landscape views along the foot hills. Springing up as if by magic are stretches of beautiful poppies of delicate yellow color, something like the buttercups in the eastern marshes only much larger, then again there are fields of violets that enrapture the sight seers as passing along. Orange as well as all deciduous fruit are beginning to bloom and the air is laden with their perfume.

The week past has been an eventful one for John Chinaman in celebrating the Chinese New Year. Chinatown at Los Angeles is gayly attired in oriental colors and designs. This New Year is a movable festival and falls on the first new moon after the sun enters Aquarius. It occurs between the 21st of January and the 19th of February. This year the festival began February 10th. From the 20th day of the 12th moon everything is suspended in the way of work and at midnight the fun begins.

The Joss house is opened to everyone, candles are lighted, incense burned, shooting fire crackers, beating tomtoms and such demoniacal gestures and noises prevail that a mad house is no comparison to it, all this is done to frighten away the evil spirits. Every family has its god to which offerings are made consisting of cakes, rice, meats and tea. These are consumed later by the family. No one allows himself any care during this week but gives away to feasting and rejoicing no matter what the future may be. The poor heathen! During this week adjust all business; all accounts are closed up and old scores are settled and everything straightened out for the New Year. Every family has for this occasion an abundant supply of the lovely Chinese lily (Narcissus) these are beatiful yellowish flower with a large white center possessing a perfume that is very penetrating and most enjoyable to the olfactory nerve. All age is reckoned from the New Year day and not from birth so that a child born the day before is considered two years old next day, from the hiring of servants to the Emperors reigne, and no matter how brief the time of business all is reckoned from New Years day.

Going the other day to Millards Canyon we passed the residence of Jason Brown son of John Brown of Harper's Ferry fame. He is doing some horticulture and raising poultry. This industry is very profitable here inasmuch as there is always a demand for it. Chickens sell from $3 50 to $5.00 per dozen and are not sold by the pound. Turkeys about 12 to 15 cents per pound etc. Eggs generally bring from 25 to 35 per dozen, at present however, they sell between 15 and 20 cents. Apparently this country has a great future before it and as the mountains unfold their untold treasures the boom of '88 will be more than repeated. In Alameda county recently coal was found varying from three to twelve feet thick and inexhaustible, likewise with crude oil which is developed in quantities beyond expectations. Our friends Dan Phillips and Ober made us a brief visit and are now east of the Rockies on their way home. I am also in receipt of a letter from Dr. Dills formerly of Ft Wayne. He is now located at Pomona, California, and writes that he is being greatly benefited from the climate change.

We have planted on our ranch this month several hundred orange trees, some English walnuts and French prunes. Planting is done up to 1st of September but February and March are the best months of the year for this kind of work. Job A. Reinoehl informs me that during his five weeks residence here has gained eleven pounds. All are well.

Yours Very Truly,
O. F. RUDOLPH.

BUTLER.

Mrs. Isaac Daily who has been on the sick list for a week or more is reported slightly improved.

Old Mr. Eddy is reported very poorly with meager hopes of recovery.

Geo. Freed has sold his Butler property to Silas Hall and removed to his farm in Troy township.

Next Sabbath will be missionary day at the M. E. church, liberal contributions are anticipated.

Dr. Jonathan Miller, one of the well known habitues of Butler met with a fatal accident on the Lake Shore train between Butler and Waterloo last Friday. He was walking from Waterloo to Butler, and was struck by a passing engine. The train men brought him to Butler where he died about one hour afterward. His funeral took place from the Disciple church last Sunday, Rev. Laird officiating. Dr. Miller came west in the late forties and settled at West Buffalo, Ohio where he practiced several years. He came to Butler when it was a struggling village in a dense elm and willow forest, in the fifties, and ranched with such contemporaries as Drs. Ladd, Stough, Milligan and Madden. For many years the expression was current, that "Dr. Miller, when not under the influence of liquor was the best doctor in the vicinity." Intemperance gradually overpowered him and for many years he has been scarcely able to support himself, and has received aid from the county. Many years ago his downfall was whispered to have been caused by an unfortunate love affair in the east. He had no relatives in this vicinity, so his funeral was a lonely one.

The ladies of the M. E. church were quite successful in their Washington Tea, realizing quite a fair sum.

CORUNNA.

J. L. McCee and Lindsey and Barker filled up their ice houses last week.

Ed Gushwa has purchased the Susan Daily property south of the railroad.

Court was in session again last Saturday in Corunna, with Judge Maxwell on the bench. Wm. Daily was plaintiff and John Lipsett defendant. The case was for the possession of the store room lately purchased by Mr. Daily. The jury failed to agree, and finally a compromise was effected. Mr. Lipset gives possession May the 1st.

A regular old fashioned blizzard struck us last week and just fairly got up on his hind legs and howled and snorted and blew his icy breath around kind of promiscuously like, until every one (not excepting the ground hog) stayed in his hole.

On account of a wreck on the Lake Shore near Edgerton Ohio, the fast mail No. 3. due here at 5 o'clock a. m., was run through on the north line to Elkhart.

Jonathan Gushwa received a telegram last Thursday informing him of the death of his brother Benjamin, of Evanston, Ill. The remains arrived here over the Lake Shore on Monday at 12:37 p. m. Funeral services were held in the M. E. church by Rev. C. Ciesel, of Fort Wayne, assisted by Rev. Speckman, on Tuesday the 25th at 10 a. m. After which all that was mortal of Benjamin Gushwa was taken to Fairfield Center, (by request of deceased before his death) and laid away to rest in the silent city of the dead.

DEKALB.

The farmers are at the ice business.

Bad colds seem to be the issue of the day.

Protracted meeting at Butler Center Chapel now with Mr. Scott at the helm.

Jacob Miller was at Chicago to see his daughter, and reports them well.

The section men at this place were out all night shoveling snow Wednesday night.

Mrs. John Fair has returned from a long and happy visit to her many friends and relatives east.

C. B. Jones of Garrett has bought Carl Fair's farm north of St. Johns. Elmer Haynes will till the soil.

Royce Fair and Johnny Moody are in the lumber business. They will put a lot of hard maple logs here to be shipped to Ft. Wayne.

John Groves of Ohio is visiting his uncle J. F. Groves at this place and will visit his sister and other relatives in Marshal and St. Joe counties, this state.

Phillip Noel and Mr. Jonathan Mangas filled their ice house with fine ice for summer use, such as ice cream and lemo parties.

James Kemery bought Fred Link's trotting horse and buggy. James won't walk to town any more. James is a good hostler.

Mr. Wm. Snyder has rented Albert Sterling's farm at Miller's saw mill and will farm it along with his farm. Mr. Snyder is a hustler.

Jacob Kandel Dead

John Kandel informed us to day of the death of his father, Jacob who died at 4:40 this morning at his home south of Fessler's Corners. Mr. Kandel was a sufferer from dropsy for some time and this with other ailments caused his death. The funeral will be held Wednesday. The friends will meet at the house at 10 a. m., and the funeral will be held in the Lutheran church here at about 12 o'clock, Revs. J. D. Brosy and Engelman officiating. The sermon will be both in English and German. Interment in Woodlawn.

Art Loan Exhibition.

For the past two months the young people have been planning for their great Art Loan Exhibition which they will give in the M. E. church basement next Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, March 3 and 4. This will give the people of Auburn a chance to see a rare collection of old curiosities never before exhibited in this city. Many articles are in the hands of the committees and will displayed at this exhibition, each containing a card, giving the age and history of the article. Clothing and dishes that our grandparents and great grandparents used may be seen. Numerous war relics fine scenery, of many years ago, and books and bibles printed back in 1700. This exhibition will take several days hard labor to get the articles all in shape and the young people feel that when the doors are opened to the public that they will have one of the finest exhibitions ever given in Auburn. An admission fee of 10 cents will be charged. Remember the dates next Tuesday and Wednesday evenings. People should come miles to see this rare collection of curiosities.

Was Cured.

HUDSON, Ind., Feb., 3, 1896.

Dr. Casebeer,

Dear Sir:—I am very thankful to you that I took treatment with you for my rupture as I am now healed and feel like a new man. For the benefit of others, I will say I was ruptured on both sides seventeen years ago and was getting worse all the time. After taking the third treatment I began to get better fast; it was without scarcely any pain. I would advise all ruptured persons to take this treatment and get cured.

State Debt.

Special to the DAILY COURIER.

Indianapolis, Ind., Feb 21.—The state board of finance has decided to pay off $300,000 of state bonds due March 2, and $100,000 of the $7,000,000 due in 1899 and payable at the option of the state. This leaves the total bonded debt of the state $6,600,000. The board believes that through the agency of the sinking fund it will be able to pay off the debt in ten years.

LUCK?

and success are two different things There are many who have luck thrust upon them, yet are not shrewd enough to grasp the opportunity and turn it to success. Many have termed the managers of the who now own the big store located on South Main street, as being a set of lucky people. If taking into consideration their business foresight, sagacity and persistency, we may also agree with them to what they term lucky. It is a well known fact that they know a good thing when the see it, and don't let a good thing slip by. They have lately rented the big store, two doors north of the Fruit House and now have in stock a fine line of Candies, Fruits, Canned Goods, Cigars Tobaccos, and in fact carry, in both stores, anything a person can wish for. Now, if you have never patronized the new Confectionery Store, do so at once. The fresh stock of Candies is the finest to be found in the city.

Tape worms are not very desirable tenants in any part of the human anatomy, but like other disagreeable tenants they get possession now and then and are hard to dislodge. Dr Baxter of this place has it in for these parasites, and I see no chance to get a whack at one of the disagreeable creatures. Just now he has the scalp of a big one, so to speak in fact has the whole thing, about sixty feet long, which he captured after a long and patient struggle. And a member of Mr. Purdy's family feels, as the saying is "greatly relieved."

Wednesday was the coldest day of the year in Chicago. At no time did the thermometer register warmer weather than zero, and nearly all day the snow flurries were in the air. Many persons were badly frost bitten and two deaths were reported as a result of the cold wave. Many traveling men carrying grips had noses and cheeks frozen.

The DAILY utterly forgot to give a good word for the nice supper furnished Tuesday evening by the Catholic men, at the Glenner House. It was excellent, and a large company sat down to the long ranges of tables to enjoy it. The younger men waited on the guests, and couldn't have done better if they had practiced six months at the world's fair. Judging from the patronage, the receipts must have been pretty good.

The next Indiana State Epworth League conference will be held at Anderson, June 25 28. As the location is central, it is expected that this will be the largest Epworth League conference ever held in the state. No effort will be spared to secure the very best speakers and to make the meeting practical and spiritual: Special sessions will be held for each department. Every M. L. Chapter in the state is urged to send delegates. The railroad rates will be announced later.

Col John Hay, Lincoln's private secretary and biographer, will contribute to McClures Magazine for March, a paper on Ellsworth, the young colonel of the Ellsworth Zouaves, who was shot down, at the beginning of the war, by an Alexandria tavern-keeper. Though but twenty-four at his death, Ellsworth had a very romantic career; and Col. Hay, having been especially intimate with him, knows all the details of it. His paper will embrace extended passages from a very interesting journal left by Ellsworth; and it with be illustrated with several portraits and other pictures.

Dr. Carey has added a fine piece of furniture to his office, and it being the product of home skill, deserves a passing notice. It is a table, which we suppose is for use in some way for operating purposes, having some attachments not well understood by printers. The table was made by John H. Weaver and is a fine piece of cabinet work, being well selected butternut for the top and carved legs of ash. The finishing, that is the polishing and varnishing, are the work of Steele and Son. The whole reflects great credit on our home workmen.

Korea has quite a rebellion on its hands. The king had caused an order to be issued that the men must cut off their long queues and wear their hair short like the western nations. So much are the people attached to this custom that many are in open revolt, and it seems to be spreading and may lose the king his throne.

The Foster Furniture Co., of Fort Wayne, advertise that they are loaded up on bedroom suits, bought by the carload because the goods were so handsome and the prices so low. Our people are growing more and more in the habit of looking to Davenport for the latest and best of everything in the drug line. They sell Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, famous for its cures of bad colds, croup and whooping cough. When in need of such a medicine give this remedy a trial and you will be more than pleased with the result. 9.

Weyler, the new captain-general of Cuba, is apparently a bloodthirsty fiend. He has issued orders that all citizens must meet at the nearest military station and be enrolled, and in case any are found to be disloyal, they are liable to be tried by a court martial, and if guilty, to be shot. He, himself will review each case, before the unfortunate man is executed, except in such cases as is difficult to send the papers to him, in which case the execution goes on and he will review the case later.

Orestes Simons, living near LaOtto, lost an arm last week by the accidental discharge of his gun. He was out hunting and stopped to rest placing his arm over the muzzle of the gun, as so many hunters do. The gun stood on a pile of brush and accidentally slipped off and in some way the hammer was caught and the gun discharged. The arm resting on the muzzle was so badly torn, that it had to be amputated. He is only about 20, but is married and the loss of an arm is a serious thing for him.

The Ligonier Banner in commenting on the COURIER criticism of the attempted apportionment acts of 1893 and 1895, seems to be a little tart, for some cause or other. Senator McDonald may be pleased to have the two counties of Noble and Whitley united into a senatorial district, instead of Noble and DeKalb, but we assure him, the people of DeKalb felt it was an uncalled for proceeding. And they felt much opposed to it, from the fact that DeKalb was made a helpless football to be kicked about from one county to another, at a time when she had no one to take any interest in her welfare or ask as to her wishes. But even these objections are overshadowed by the more insurmountable one, that the legislatures of '93 and '95 had no power to make an apportionment for legislative purposes. The members of that body, should have known this.

Saxby McIntosh came down from Edon Saturday evening and remained over Sunday. He reports all well there, the Independent flourishing, and Mr. Weeks' people in fair health.

H. M. Henning, of Waterloo, has sold his property in that city and will soon by property in Auburn and move here. Mr and Mrs. Hennnig will be welcomed to our city.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. H. E. Richey was made pleasant this morning by the advent of a little baby, a son at their residence on South Cedar street as reported by Mrs. Swarts. We send congratulations.

A girl baby was born Saturday to Mr and Mrs. Fred Keller on West 11th street. Mr Keller is the popular pastor of the German Lutheran church and is to be congratulated on his good fortune. Reported by Mrs. Swarts.

As Mrs Nate Alvord was preparing or supper last night, the grease in the pan in which she was frying meat exploded. Her face was badly burned, and also one of her eyes. She suffered considerable pain all night. Dr. Carey is treating her.

We were agreeably surprised to day to meet Mel Richmond, of Wolf Lake, Noble county, who is here a guest of W. H. McCrory, of the Auburn Iron Works. They are old-time friends. Mr. Richmond was a pupil of ye editor over thirty years ago, and the casual meeting was very pleasant to both.

The latest fad is for silver dollars of 1895, of which it is claimed only about 1,000 were made last year. Why not go back to several points in the first 80 years of our government when still fewer were made? It should not be forgotten that before silver was "demonetized" in 1873, we had in all this 80 years made only about 8 millions of silver dollars. But in the few years since it was "demonetized" we have made 375 millions of silver dollars and purchased 125 millions of bars of silver which the mints are now starting to work up into dollars. And again, these facts show how little there is in these quarrels over silver.

The talkee-talkee has begun again. A number of men started up a silver discussion Saturday afternoon with Dave Smith as a central figure, and had it hot and heavy for an hour or two. If the people would stop to realize how little there is in this silver question they would not waste so much time on it. There is nothing at all in it for farmers. A few mine owners might be benefited by having a law that would compel Uncle Sam to pay double price for all the silver that could be brought to him by the mine owners. But this extra price would come out of the millions of farmers, who would gain nothing in return. Farmers would be as well justified in asking uncle Sam to buy their wheat at $1 a bushel. But they don't seem to think of that.

One of Shull's milk wagons took a flying sail down street Saturday evening. The rig was in front of Hollister's waiting for the driver to come back from in the hotel, when just at that moment, Mr. Bye, who was going to show his extinguisher, applied the torch to the pile of dry lumber and kerosene oil. The blaze flashed high, and the horse gave a jump and away it went down Main street and out of sight. It did not stop till it reached home in the southwest part of town, where it ran to the barn and went into the shed where it was used to wait, and everything was safe and sound. But it is a wonder it did not collide with some team down the street.

SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR

THE BEST
is SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR—don't forget to take it. The Liver gets sluggish during the Winter, just like all nature, and the system becomes choked up by the accumulated waste, which brings on Malaria, Fever and Ague and Rheumatism. You want to wake up your Liver now, but be sure you take SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR to do it. It also regulates the Liver—keeps it properly at work, when your system will be free from poison and the whole body invigorated.

You get THE BEST BLOOD when your system is in A1 condition, and that will only be when the Liver is kept active. Try a Liver Remedy once and note the difference. But take only SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR—it is SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR which makes the difference. Take it in powder or in liquid already prepared, or make a tea of the powder; but take SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR. You'll find the RED Z on every package. Look for it.

Dr. Chas. E. Miller specialist in lenses for the eye, will again be at F. J. Yoder's jewelry store, Saturday, March 7. Those who need glasses, and especially those who have had difficulty in getting them suited to their eyes, are invited to call.

Thomas Cunningham, of Hecla Whitley county, was here last Wednesday, to see his sister Mrs. H. A. Croy, who is sick. He brought with him, Dr. Will Scott of the same place, in hope that some aid might be given the patient. But he considers her case hopeless, as do the physicians here. We are sorry to hear this, as Mrs. Croy is a most worthy woman.

At the meeting of the Rathbone Sisters last night Mrs. Alice Gregg was the victim of a grand surprise. The sisters presented her with a very beautiful Past Chief Jewel, as a token, for the position she has held in the lodge and the high esteem in which she is held by her many friends. She feels very grateful to the Temple for this beautiful present.

This is a good time of the year to take Simmons Liver Regulator. It is the very best medicine to take in the Spring for the blood, and to cleanse the system of all impurity. The patent which a Brooklyn genius has procured on bloomers will not protect the bloomer girls from the bicycle stare this summer.

The charm of the household is when good manners are so perfectly natural as to reduce all friction to a minimum and banish rudeness into oblivion.

There are three kinds of praise—that which we yield, that which we lend, and that which we pay. We yield praise to the powerful from fear, we lend it to the weak from interest, and we pay it to the deserving from gratitude.

In a trial for arson at Columbia, Mo., Judge Gillispie set fire to a pile of rags saturated with oil to see if they would burn. After an ineffectual fight by the fire department to save the court-house the Judge decided they they burned. There will be no appeal.

One of the things that the honest but unsophisticated newspaper reader cannot find out is why in reporting an assignment the assignee invariably puts the assets in excess of the liabilities, when, if this were true, there would have been no bankruptcy.

Susan B. Anthony says it is all right for a woman to pop the question to a man she loves, whether it is leap year or not. Now that woman has become a breadwinner, she is no longer in a position to wait for proposals. She can take care of herself and her husband, too, is necessary.

A great many of the farmers who have sold good Iowa, Nebraska, and South Dakota farms in order to go South for the climate and cheap lands are already tired of their bargains and are coming back. Many say they prefer the cold and invigorating climate of the North to the damp and enervating climate of the South.

Sincerity and politeness can and ought to go side by side, and they would do so if they were both esteemed and cherished at their real worth. It is not the exaggeration of either that is at fault; no one can be too sincere, no one can be too polite. It is the absence of either that is to be deplored; yet some will even pride themselves upon the lack of one, as if it showed their great loyalty to the other.

The kind of fighting in Cuba that is dignified with the name of war is shown clearly by recent official dispatches received by the Spanish minister at Washington. In one "battle" three revolutionists were killed and eleven wounded. In another five were slain, but the climax was reached in an engagement in which there were no casualties, but one woman was captured. This reads like a burlesque, but it is actual fact. It is not war nor is it magnificent; it is simply a caricature of real fighting.

General John Gibbon, one of the most distinguished commanders of the iron brigade in the army of the Potomac, died in Baltimore the 6th inst. after a brief illness. General Gibbon was 69 years old and was retired from the regular army five years ago. He was elected in 1895 commander in chief of the Loyal Legion, an association of former commissioned officers of the Union army. When his fatal sickness began he was about starting for the various Loyal Legion commanderies. General Gibbon is the only commander in chief of the Loyal Legion who has died in office. His predecessors were General Grant, General Sherman, General Sheridan, General Hancock, General Hayes, and General Lucius Fairchild. He was one of the bravest and best soldiers of the war and was regarded as a hero by the many thousands of men who served in his various commands. The iron brigade which he commanded was composed of three Wisconsin regiments, one regiment from Indiana and one from Michigan.

The effort to keep up appearances and to maintain a style of living that cannot be rightly afforded is probably the cause of more bankruptcies, more frauds, embezzlements, forgeries, and general financial ruin than anything else. Many people who, sooner than forfeit their honesty, would willingly sacrifice their own comfort and endure hardships will yet palter and hesitate when called upon to resign for honor's sake their fancied respectability. To give up luxury or ease would be a comparatively easy matter; but to give up the good opinion of the world, or rather of that little fragment of it to which they have adhered, is so terrible to their imagination that the meanest subterfuges and even immoralities seem preferable. Truth, virtue, self-respect, and integrity are all outweighed by the fear of not being respectable. Even life itself is sometimes thrown away from the same terror. The ruined man who could have endured hardship and have toiled unremittingly to amend his fortunes cannot brave the supercilious glances of scorn and contempt from those who once flattered and looked up to him, and he seeks a cowardly refuge in death itself.

Chicago Chronicle: If the scientists, medical, electrical and bacteriological, are to be credited with ability to perform half the wonders to which they now make claim the life of man in the coming century should be prolonged by twice the space of three score years and ten prescribed by the Scriptures as the normal stopping time in this world. Nearly every day brings to the newspapers intelligence of the discovery of some new curative agent, some new aid to diagnosis. One day ex-Mayor Hewitt has been miraculously cured of the liver complaint which has so long ruffled his temper by sitting for ten minutes in the electrical chair of Nicola Tesla. Dr. Cyrus Edson, of the New York Board of Health, follows swiftly with announcement of a positive cure for consumption. Diphtheria is declared conquered by two or three new remedies. The virtues of Koch's lymph and antitoxin are learnedly discussed from Paris to Pueblo. Finally comes Roentgen with his discovery of a light by which the exact location of a foreign substance in animal flesh may be discovered and distinguished surgeons thus saved from the mortification of incorrectly locating the bullet in a gunshot wound as they did in the case of President Garfield and in thousands less famous. One does not have to give credence to the new theory, excitedly advanced in New York last Saturday, that the Roentgen rays possess actual life-giving properties, in order to understand the value of this discovery. Notwithstanding this rapid multiplication of panaceas for all human ills—save those of the pocket—people seem to die with about the same regularity. Perhaps the trouble is that the scientists invent new diseases as fast as they invent cures. Heart failure and appendicitis began to be popular ways of bidding adieu to the sorrows and worries of this life just as a Paris doctor announced his discovery of a nostrum which was to make human life eternal. The elixir of life was forgotten after it proved an elixir of death to one or two enterprising reporters who made a test of it for journalistic purposes. Heart failure and appendicitis, however, have lost nothing of their vogue. It cannot be said that human life has gained in duration with the advance of medical science. We have no Methuselahs to-day, and the perennial colored woman who nursed George Washington in his infancy has not been saved from the common fate of all flesh by the applications of modern medical science. Yet perhaps all is explainable by the fact that what we call civilization has brought with it new perils to human health. We live in crowded cities, pollute the air we breathe with smoke and dust, wall out the sun from our homes that the landlord may profit by housing twenty families where five might live in health, affright our ears with cable gongs, darken our streets with elevated railways and "sky scrapers"—live, in short, in such an atmosphere and amid such surroundings as might well reduce the normal years of human life by half. That there has been in fact no apparent decrease in the average years of man upon the earth in the last three centuries affords a modicum of proof that at least medical science has kept pace with civilization's multiplication of menaces to health.

THE FATHER OF PHOTOGRAPHY.

Death of Matthew Benjamin Brady in New York.

Matthew Benjamin Brady, of New York, whose death occurred in that city recently, was justly considered the father of photography—the pioneer in one of the most useful arts in the world. For the past forty-five years he had met every man of prominence in the country or who came here from other lands, and the collection of photographs he leaves is invaluable from a historical standpoint. Brady was a portrait painter and a personal friend of Prof. Morse, the inventor of electric telegraphy. It was Morse who first suggested to Brady that it might be more profitable to take portraits by the camera than delineating them on canvas with the brush. This was in 1849, and Brady opened a gallery in Fulton street, New York city. Year after year the Brady photographs improved in tone and increased in size, but portraits were seldom taken larger than four inches by two and a half. In 1860 Mr. Brady opened a branch gallery on Pennsylvania avenue, Washington, which was destined to become his headquarters. In 1861, when the first shots were fired in the great civil war, Washington was thronged by men whose names were destined to occupy important places in the pages of American history.

MATTHEW B. BRADY.

Obtaining the consent of the Secretary of War Mr. Brady fitted out three or four wagons and followed the army, taking pictures which to-day are extremely valuable. The negatives of these war pictures and portraits were sold to the United States government a few years ago for the sum of $50,000.

Passing the Dardanelles.

A fight between the English fleet and those of France and Russia for the control of the sea of Marmora would be a most striking and startling episode of "the Eastern question." Turkey's naval power need not be reckoned, for it is almost nil. There are but a few very old vessels that fly the Sultan's pennant, and in organization the Turkish navy can hardly be "placed" in making a list of the world's strength at sea.

That the passage of the Dardanelles by the English fleet would be difficult is the general impression here and abroad, and is supported by the testimony of American officers familiar with the approaches to Constantinople. Yet there is a wide difference between the difficult and the impossible. The Dardanelles were passed by an English fleet almost ninety years ago, and though the vessels were roughly handled and were of course all sailing ships, they made way in against all the resistance the Turks could offer, and subsequently when their mission had been accomplished fought their way out. True the straits are planted with torpedoes, but so was Mobile bay when Farragut led his fleet past the fortifications and pounded the Confederate ironclad to surrender. Farragut lost one vessel by torpedoes, but the rest kept on. Farragut's signal at Mobile, "Damn the torpedoes! Go ahead!" was and perhaps is still the motto on the title page of the manual furnished the Russian naval cadets by their government. Should there come a conflict for the command of the Dardanelles it would afford a good test of the capacity of modern battleships as well as of commanders. If a difficult strait heavily fortified cannot be forced by a fleet admitted to be made up of the most powerful ships afloat, of what avail is it to spend millions on floating fortresses that are terribly expensive to build and useless save when disparity of force is in their favor?—Boston Transcript.

NANSEN AND THE POLE

NORWEGIAN EXPLORER'S SUCCESS NOT CONFIRMED.

Report Reaches St. Petersburg that the Daring Navigator Has Found the Pole—News Not Authentic, and Scientists Are Skeptical.

Further News Awaited.

The reported north pole discovery by Dr. Nansen is being given much attention by the press, but scientists generally are inclined to be skeptical, without denying the possibilities or truth of the report. The story comes as a telegram from Irkutsk, Siberia, and says that a Siberian trader named Kouchnareff, agent of Dr. Fridtjof Nansen, the Norwegian explorer, who sailed in the Fram June 24, 1893, for the Arctic regions, has received information that Dr. Nansen reached the north pole, found land there, and is now returning toward civilization.

The news from Dr. Nansen was received at Irkutsk from Ust Yacht, at the mouth of the Yana river. The Yana river falls into the Arctic ocean by several mouths in latitude 70 degrees north and longitude 137 degrees east of Greenwich. Ust Yacht, or Ust Yansk, is one of these. In fact, Ust, or Ost, is the Russian name for the mouth of a river. Ust Yansk is only a little more than 100 miles from Liakov island, which is one of the new Siberian islands. The mouth of the Yana is considerably over 100 miles east of the Lena delta.

EXPLORER NANSEN AND HIS WIFE.

The ill-fated Jeanette was crushed in the ice in 77 degrees 15 minutes north latitude and 155 degrees east longitude on June 13, 1881. This point is to the northeast of the New Siberian islands. Those of the expedition who reached land came 500 miles in boats and sleds to do it. Their point of arrival was west and north of Ust Yansk.

When Lieut. Peary was seen at New York and asked whether in his judgment any reliance was to be placed on the report that Dr. Nansen had reached the north pole and is now returning he promptly replied that what with the meagerness of the dispatch, the locality from which the news comes, and the season, it does not seem to him as likely to be authentic. Dr. Nansen, if his theory in regard to the current be correct, Lieut. Peary said, would not be likely to ever get back in that direction. He expected to cross the pole and to come out somewhere on the east coast of Greenland. If Nansen or any of his party is where it is said he is, the lieutenant thought the message should come direct from him. At the time this is written the report has not yet been confirmed and cannot be considered authentic.

FRIDJOF NANSEN, PH. D.

Sailing of the Fram.

Dr. Nansen and his crew of eleven men sailed out of the port of Christiania at noon on the 24th of June, 1893. Thousands of his enthusiastic fellow countrymen assembled on the docks and the harbor was filled with every variety of craft, from a kyak canoe to a steam launch, all gayly decorated with bunting and silver birch. As the Fram passed the point on which his home is located Dr. Nansen was on deck to wave a farewell salute to his wife, who stood in front of the house, clad in a dress of pure white. Salutes of three guns were fired from the various batteries as the Fram passed them on her way to the perilous Arctic seas.

Various messages, some of extremely doubtful authenticity, have been received during the long interval since the expedition embarked. One of these was a dispatch sent out from Christiania Dec. 8, 1895, which said that Mrs. Nansen had received a letter tied to a carrier pigeon, stating that Dr. Nansen and his venturesome associates were safe and that the expedition was progressing satisfactorily. The well-known fact that no pigeons were taken in the Fram, together with a lack of definiteness as to the location of the party, combined to discredit in popular estimation the authenticity of the letter.

April 15 last year great excitement was Figaro of a dispatch that Dr. Nansen had reached the north pole, planted a flag of caused by the publication in the Paris Norway upon it and was returning in triumph. This rumor was not generally credited by scientists or navigators and was not confirmed by any subsequent and reliable information from the plucky party of Arctic explorers. Other alleged news from Dr. Nansen was been published from time to time. One dispatch, bearing date of March 4, 1895, was sent from London and contained the statement that a letter had been received at Hammerfest, Norway, dated at Kjollefjord, Feb. 24. This letter contained the statement that a balloon had been sighted by a telegraph inspector, located between Lebesy and Langfjord, and that it doubtless contained a message from Nansen.

The last reliable information from the explorer was a dispatch from Vardoe, dated Aug. 23, 1893, and signed by Charabowa, stating that the Fram was about to enter the Kara sea.

Nansen's Arctic Theory.

Since his twenty-second year Dr. Nansen has been contemplating crossing the north pole, and with that end in view has been diligently studying the Arctic ocean currents. He noticed the two large currents flowing down the coast of Greenland out of the polar regions. Approximate calculations showed that an enormous quantity of water was thus transported southwardly. Of course, it would be impossible for the polar ocean to continue to yield such great volumes of water unless similar streams were somewhere flowing into it. Dr. Nansen sought their source on the opposite side of the pole off the coast of Siberia, where he discovered a great current which moved steadily toward the pole. Not only did the water flow toward the pole, but the thick ice crust was carried by the stream in the same direction. The idea struck Dr. Nansen that it would be possible to drift across the pole starting off the coast of Siberia and coming out by way of Greenland. This idea was strengthened by the result of James Gordon Bennett's Jeannette expedition of 1882-3.

Dr. Nansen considered this theory demonstrated and reasoned that if he could have placed himself upon the stores lost by the Jeannette he would have crossed with them the polar sea. But this is far from the only proof of a transpolar current. Every week large quantities of driftwood arrive on Spitzbergen island and Greenland coasts by the polar route from Siberia. In this way the Eskimo is provided with all the wood he needs for houses, tools and fire. Without it he could not exist. Furthermore, Dr. Nansen caused experts to examine the earth and rocks found on the ice which drifts along the Greenland coast, and it was decided that these were identical with those of Siberia and must have drifted on the ice across the pole.

Even if the theory of an open polar sea should not prove a reality, Dr. Nansen is likely to have passed through the mysterious region frozen tightly into an immense ice palace over which he will have no control. In this case it is not certain that he was able to pass directly over the pole, but may have been carried some little distance to either side of it. He was in hopes, however, with the assistance of his dogs and sleighs to reach the very point where the earth's axle terminates the true geographical pole.

WORK OF CONGRESS.

THE WEEK'S DOINGS IN SENATE AND HOUSE.

A Comprehensive Digest of the Proceedings in the Legislative Chambers at Washington—Matters that Concern the People.

Lawmakers at Labor.

The speech of Senator Davis of Minnesota, supporting the resolution of which he is the author, enunciating the policy of the United States on the Monroe doctrine, was the event of Monday in the Senate. Senator Mitchell of Oregon, chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, presented the views of the majority of the committee favoring the seating of Mr. Dupont as Senator from Delaware. The agricultural appropriation bill occupied the attention of the House. An amendment was pending when the House adjourned making mandatory the execution of the provision in the bill for the distribution of seed. An amendment appropriating $42,360 for a new edition of the "Horse Book" was adopted. Mr. Dalzell, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a resolution of inquiry calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for an exhaustive report relative to the sale of bonds under the resumption act between the two periods of 1879 and March 1, 1893, and between the latter date and Jan. 1, 1896. The resolution was adopted.

The session of the Senate Tuesday furnished a succession of breezy incidents with frequent sharp personal exchanges between Senators. Mr. Hill had a lively tilt with Mr. Tillman during the debate on Mr. Peffer's resolution for a Senate investigation of the recent bond issue. Mr. Allen joined issue with Mr. Gear and Mr. Wolcott over the course of the Pacific Railway Committee in conducting its inquiry. Two appropriation bills, the military academy and the pension bill, were passed. Efforts were made to amend the military academy bill by increasing the number of cadets by two from each State—ninety in all—but after a debate of three hours the plan was defeated. The pension appropriation bill, carrying $142,000,000, was passed after ten minutes' debate. The House passed the agricultural appropriation bill. It carries $3,158,192. The section of the revised statutes for the purchase and distribution of "rare and uncommon" seed which Secretary Morton declined to execute in the current appropriation law was repealed; the appropriation for seed was increased from $130,000 to $150,000, and its execution was made mandatory upon the Secretary.

The House devoted itself strictly to business Wednesday. The army appropriation bill, carrying $23,275,902, was passed, the conference report on the urgent deficiency bill was accepted, and the bill to extend for five years the time in which the government can bring suits to annul patents to public lands under railroad and wagon road grants was passed. An amendment was adopted limiting the application of the act to "railroad and wagon road grants." The substitute for the bill offered by Mr. McRae (Dem.) of Arkansas to repeal outright the limitation of the act of 1891 was defeated, 72—149. In the Senate Mr. Carter of Montana offered a resolution to recommit the tariff bill to the finance committee for further consideration. The diplomatic and consular appropriation bill was passed during the day. About sixty private pension bills were passed during the day. The bill pensioning the widow of the late Secretary Gresham as brigadier general, at $200 monthly, with an amendment making the amount $100 monthly, went over without action in order to permit Mr. Voorhees to speak against this amendment.

The Senate Thursday was engaged in the Pacific railroad hearing. In the House the conference report on the diplomatic and consular bill was agreed to, the Senate amendments to the pension bill were sent to conference and the Indian appropriation bill was taken up. The latter bill carries $8,630,995, or $132,792 less than the law for the current year. In connection with a proposition to increase the salaries of Indian inspectors from $2,500 to $3,000, the salaries fixed by law—the bills of the last two years have only appropriated $2,500 each for these salaries—both Mr. Cannon and Mr. Dingley, the Republican leaders on the floor appealed to the majority in view of the situation of the treasury to keep down expenses and refuse to take steps in the direction of increased salaries, but their appeals were in vain and the action of the Committee on Indian Affairs in restoring the salaries was sustained, 87 to 59. Nothing else of importance was done.

The House devoted all day Friday to consideration of the Indian bill, and made slow progress. In committee of the whole it refused to reduce salaries of Indian inspectors from $3,000 to $2,500. The Senate was still occupied with the Pacific Railroad hearing.

Gasoline Bicycle.

A gasoline bicycle is the latest. The gasoline is contained in a reservoir, and the vapor ignited by a lamp so as to explode in the cylinder and work the piston backwards and forwards. The piston turns the rear or driving-wheel of the bicycle round, and the whole machine is moved forward or backward as the case may be. The rider has only to start, stop, and steer, or regulate the speed. The new bicycle is coming rapidly into favor all over the Continent. It may be added that a cellular tire for cycles has made its appearance, the indiarubber containing cells or chambers of oval section, and elasticity comparable to that of the pneumatic tire.

CURE FOR PHTHISIS.

"ASEPTOLIN" SAID TO BE A CERTAIN REMEDY.

Dr. Edson Discovers a Beneficent Form of Carbolic Acid—It Kills Germs, but Does Not Harm the Human Tissues.

Encouraging Number of Recoveries.

Dr. Cyrus Edson, ex-commissioner of health for the city and county of New York, announces that he has discovered a remedy for consumption. Already, he declares, many victims of the dread disease have been cured by it. In the last issue of the Medical Record, under the caption "A Rational Treatment for Phthisis Pulmonalis, Together With Some Notes on a New Remedial Solution," the doctor gives a description of his discovery. The name of the new remedy is "Aseptolin." It is a beneficient form of the ordinarily dangerous carbolic acid and is injected under the skin, by which operation it finds its way into the blood and to the seat of disease. Upon authority of Prof. Henry A. Mott, aseptolin is composed as follows:

Water	97.2411 per cent
Phenol	2.7401 per cent
Pilocarpin-phenyl-hydroxide	0.188 per cent

In order to understand Dr. Edson's discovery it is necessary to remember that Pasteur and Koch discovered and established the fact that germ diseases had as their ultimate cause the presence in the body of minute organisms, called germs, microbes and the like. It was not long before these germs were cultivated, as it was called.

Having these cultivated colonies, scientific men made many experiments. They found disinfectants would kill these germs. They found, for example, that if a mixture of one part phenol or carbolic acid to three-thousand parts of water were floated over a colony of germs and left there for twenty-four hours all these germs died. It naturally occurred to them that if carbolic acid would kill germs outside the body it would kill them inside, and the conclusion that if they could kill all the germs in the body they could destroy the cause of the disease and thus cure the latter was apparent. The experiment was promptly tried. The result was some of those in whom these injections were put developed abscesses at the point of injection. Far more, however, were poisoned by the acid and the idea had to be given up. It was too fascinating, though. Declat of Paris made a mixture of one part of the acid to one hundred of water and, putting in a little salt, continued the injections, getting from them a larger percentage of cures.

DR. CYRUS EDSON.

Aseptolin Is Produced.

Dr. Edson had his attention directed to this subject in the early part of 1895, and after a long and tedious experiment produced a fluid which he called aseptolin. It is perfectly colorless, looks like crystal, and smells strongly of carbolic acid. It contains 2.75 per cent of carbolic acid, and to every ounce of it there is added one-hundredth of a grain of a new salt discovered by Dr. Edson during his work—a salt called pilocarpin-phenyl-hydroxide. The aseptolin is injected under the skin and thus directly into the blood. The dose is 100 minims, or drops, injected with a hypodermic syringe once in twenty-four hours.

Now, what happens after the injection? If the total amount of blood in the person be remembered it will be seen that after the injection the blood becomes a liquid, having one part of carbolic acid to from 1,200 to 1,500 parts of blood. In other words, it is a liquid from 2 to 2½ times as strong with the acid as was the one to 3,000 solution which killed the cultivated germs. The circulation of the blood applies this carbolic solution to every part of the body many times in an hour. Wherever there is disease and the germs which cause it that spot is being continually washed with this carbolic solution, in which no germ can live more than five hours.

Tuberculosis—consumption—is a germ disease, being caused by what are called tubercle bacilli.

Dr. Edson discovered aseptolin in September, 1895. To date, according to the doctor's statement, 217 persons having consumption have been treated with it. Of these, four showed no improvement, and of the four one died. The rest, 213, showed improvement. Of these, twenty-three have been discharged cured, sixty-seven will, in the opinion of the physicians having the cases, be discharged cured, making ninety in all. In ninety-one cases the patients have been under treatment for too short a time to enable the attending physicians to say anything except, "The patients are better." In thirty-two cases the improvement was only temporary, but this record means about 40 per cent of cures, and these cases have been those of patients with the disease in all stages.

SLAIN BY DYNAMITE.

Explosion Lays Part of Johannesburg in Ruins.

An explosion of dynamite has occurred at Viendendorp and the poor quarter of Johannesburg, Transvaal, has been blown to pieces. The windows of every house in the city were broken by the force of the concussion. The scene of the explosion is the old town and is fortunately at a distance from the main business and residence portion of the city. It was inhabited largely by Kaffirs, the dwellings being of an inferior order for the most part.

The explosion caused much excitement at first because of the recent disturbances in the Transvaal and the fear that it might have been due to a political coup. There was therefore a general turning out of the guards to see that no violence followed the wreck. The cause was soon learned and the excitement subsided in a measure. It rose again when the fearful nature of the catastrophe became known. The portion of the city demolished was thickly populated, although there were comparatively few whites who lived there. The dynamite which caused the catastrophe filled eight trucks, which were being shunted. The explosion caused an immense hole thirty feet deep. Every house within a radius of half a mile of the explosion was razed to the ground. Forty dead, nearly all terribly mutilated, have been taken from ruins. Two hundred of the most severely injured were admitted to the hospital, where several died.

STARVED, KILLED, AND PICKLED.

Terrible Cruelty Meted Out to the Worn-Out Horses of New York.

Over in the woods near Jamaica, L. I., many of the worn-out horses of New York city are collected and killed. After a merciful death has overtaken the poor animals they are pickled and sent abroad to be eaten by human beings. According to facts which have just come to light an awful crime is committed against the animal before his poor bleeding flesh and his marrowless bones reach the pickling vat. Noble creatures that once pranced exultingly up and down Fifth avenue, the pet, perchance, of charming, lovable women and their beautiful children, are treated with less consideration than is given the machines that chop them into sausage meat. So terrible and open has the negligence of the slaughter house men become that public officials have been forced to interfere and several arrests have been made.

An officer of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals recently paid a visit to the place. He says: "If you have a soft place in your heart for horses don't go there. To say nothing of its being the nastiest place I ever saw, it was the cruelest. They had a drove of horses there waiting to be killed; some of them had been waiting two days, and without a thing to eat or a drop to drink. A few of them were in a shed, and the others were tied to trees near by. All of them were in the mud. Those in the shed had gnawed holes through it in several places, holes big enough for them to stick their heads out of, and, oh, the hungry look in their eyes. Those outside had gnawed the bark off the trees as high as they could reach.

WAITING TO BE KILLED.

"Two skeletons had each an end of the same branch; neither was strong enough to pull it from the other, so they leaned together and chewed away, making believe. Some of the horses were lying down, and there they stayed. They hadn't the strength to get up. Perhaps they had frozen in the night before. The mud was red with drippings from the slaughter house."

CROP REPORTS.

"Farmers' Review" Correspondents Tell About Wheat and Rye.

Reports have been received from the Farmers' Review correspondents in ten States on the condition of winter wheat and winter rye.

In Illinois the condition is at present about fair, though presenting a great variety of developments. In the counties that report a low condition, the present state has been brought about by a dry fall and late seeding. In Indiana the growth has been fair, but there has been some damage by freezing and thawing. Ohio reports indicate the general condition as fair to poor, a great deal of the wheat not having made a fair growth by reason of a dry fall. Some of the seed sown did not come up at all. In Michigan the crop is in better condition, and has been covered with snow nearly all winter, though the plant generally made little growth in the fall. The condition in Kentucky is hardly fair, at present, and in some counties is very poor. Missouri reports that in a good many counties the plant is yet very small. It seems, however, to be healthy, and to have been injured little as yet by thawing and freezing. In Kansas the present outlook for wheat is good. Some localities report freezing and thawing of the crop, and there may be some little loss on this account. Nebraska reports a general average of fair, though in some counties the outlook is very poor. In Iowa the crop is very uneven, and the reports vary all the way from very fair to very good. Wisconsin reports indicate that the general condition for the State is low. Some counties report good, but in many the plant is in bad shape. Some counties have planted very little winter wheat.

Winter rye is in fair to good condition in Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, poor in Kentucky, fair in Missouri, generally good in Kansas, fair to good in Nebraska, Iowa and Wisconsin. In most of the States the plant is small, on account of dry weather in the fall.

THE BROWN SNOW.

Chief of the Weather Bureau Explains the Phenomenon.

Amateur microscopists wiped the dust from their lenses and proceeded to study the snow which spread a slate-colored mantle over the Northwest Tuesday night. After long gazing and much figuring various opinions were reached. Each opinion had a public following until Prof. Willis L. Moore, chief of the weather bureau, sent a dispatch from Washington presenting his view of what spoiled the snow. Then the audiences of the amateur observers grew smaller. Prof. Moore said:

"The black snow that has fallen lately in Chicago and the Northwest is entirely similar to the great fall of January, 1895, the nature of which was thoroughly investigated by the weather bureau at that time. Microscopic examination proved that the black deposit contained organic structures—such as diatoms and spores—and about 6 per cent. of the finest possible inorganic matter, such as make up the ordinary fine silt and clay soils. This fine material is easily caught up by the winds whenever they exceed twenty miles an hour. It may be carried great distances, and it is readily brought down by snow or rain. Large portions of the country from Nebraska southward are covered by this fine soil. A gale of wind has been known to carry away six inches of this fine soil and deposit it at a distance of 100 miles."

The Greatest Medical Discovery of the Age.

KENNEDY'S MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

DONALD KENNEDY, OF ROXBURY, MASS.,

Has discovered in one of our common pasture weeds a remedy that cures every kind of Humor, from the worst Scrofula down to a common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both thunder humor). He has now in his possession over two hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston. Send postal card for book.

A benefit is always experienced from the first bottle, and a perfect cure is warranted when the right quantity is taken.

When the lungs are affected it causes shooting pains, like needles passing through them; the same with the Liver or Bowels. This is caused by the ducts being stopped, and always disappears in a week after taking it. Read the label.

If the stomach is foul or bilious it will cause squeamish feelings at first.

No change of diet ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it. Dose, one tablespoonful in water at bedtime. Sold by all Druggists.

RIPANS TABULES

Mr. Henry Senior, residing in Brooklyn, N. Y., is one of the few wood engravers who continue to do commercial work. His office in New York is in the same building with the counting room of the Ripans Chemical Co. Three or four years ago Mr. Senior was presented with a box of Ripans Tabules. These he took home. Ever since that day he has been a regular customer. His wife's mother is pronounced in the opinion that for gastric troubles, or for any irregularity proceeding from a disordered stomach, the Tabules are the best medicine to which her attention has ever been directed during all her long experience. His wife at one time astonished him by asserting that for a sore throat the Tabules were a remedy of amazing effectiveness. He understands this better now since he has learned from his physician that sore throat—like many other apparently local troubles, notably headache—is often a direct result of a disordered stomach; and for this Mr. Senior well knows that the Tabules are a specific.

Ripans Tabules are sold by druggists, or by mail, if the price (60 cents a box) is sent to The Ripans Chemical Company, No. 10 Spruce St., New York. Sample vial, 10 cents.

PLEA OF HYPOCRITES.

SPECIOUS LYING OF PROTECTIONISTS.

They Want High Tariff for Private Gain, and Never Voluntarily Increase Wages—Wool Industry Shows Very Marked Increased Activity.

Do They Want High Wages?

Manufacturers who always hire the cheapest labor pretend that protection makes labor dear. For nearly four years after each presidential election the Republican manufacturers use every means in their power to reduce the wages of their employes, or to prevent an advance through a combination of the workers. That the employers as a class are opposed to increasing wages is shown by the strikes against wage reductions, or for higher pay, which annually disturb the industrial world. The American workingmen know that their efforts to better their condition through increased wages are in all cases strongly resisted by the men to whom they sell their labor, and expect concessions to their demands only when their employers are unable to get cheaper workers to fill their places.

While the manufacturers carry on their business on the principle that they should pay the lowest possible wages, they have an entirely different story to tell when they are trying to elect a President who will represent their selfish interests. All at once they forget that they have been cutting down wages or refusing to increase them, and appeal to the country to vote for their candidate because they want to pay higher wages. The same men who in private lose no opportunity to hire the cheapest workers, in public pose as the champions of well paid labor. Thus the National Association of Manufacturers, composed of men who never raise wages unless compelled to do so by trades-unions, through a threatened or actual strike, recently adopted resolutions declaring that Congress should give them more protection against foreign competition, so that they could increase the pay of their employes! What they really meant was that they wanted bigger profits. The higher-wages pretense was simply the bait with which they hoped to catch votes of gullible workingmen.

Protection does and can do nothing to increase the prices paid for labor. Wages are fixed by the competition of all workers seeking employment. There is no tariff on imported labor and manufacturers can hire the newly arrived immigrant as freely as the native-born citizen. The McKinley tariff did not prevent a general wage reduction in 1893, when at least a million workers had their pay cut down, nor the thousands of instances in 1890, 1891, and 1892, when even such professional friends of labor as Andrew Carnegie and George M. Pullman reduced the wages of their employes. Instead of raising wages, high protection decreased them.

Intelligent workingmen will not be deceived by the hypocrisy of the men who have grown rich through high-tariff laws. They know that if the Republican manufacturers were sincere many of them could now well afford to pay higher wages. They also know that the same men who promise that if the McKinley traiff is restored wages will advance, will lose no opportunity to employ cheaper labor or cut down their employes' wages. For these reasons the humbug election cry, "Protection and Better Wages," will not make Republican votes in the coming campaign.

What Was Done with the Wool?

The New York Press thinks it has found an argument against the Wilson tariff in the statement of imports of wool for the last two years. The official returns show that in 1894 we imported 115,736,820 pounds of wool, and in 1895, 248,289,217 pounds. The Press considers this increase a great calamity, and weeps over the alleged loss to American wool growers and woolen manufacturers. It claims that under free wool our woolen mills have shut down or run on short time, and denies that any one has been benefitted by the increased imports of wool.

If the Press is correct in saying that the woolen industry is doing less business than in 1894, when wool was heavily taxed, there must be a lot of stupid wool merchants in this country. For if two hundred and forty-eight million pounds of foreign wool has been brought here merely to be stored in warehouses, somebody must have lost a great deal of money. But the Press is wrong, as usual. The weekly wool market reports show that the immense quantities of wool have practically all been bought for consumption by the woolen manufactuers, and that there is no more than the average stocks on hand. So that the mills which the Press falsely says were idle during the past year, were really busily engaged in converting much more wool into cloth and other finished products than in 1894.

Protectionists have to swallow some pretty big yarns from their tariff organs. But they surely cannot be expected to believe that an industry which thus increases the amount of raw material used in one year, is in a worse condition because of such increase. Two hundred and forty-eight million pounds of wool cannot get itself manufactured without giving employment to labor. And the thousands of skilled woolen operatives who have had their wages increased during the past year are decidedly of the opinion that more wool means more work, and that more work means prosperity for both employers and employed.

The Greedy Nail Ring.

The close combination of manufacturers of nails (both wire and cut) has raised its prices again, this time adding 15 cents per keg. The wholesale price of wire nails at Pittsburg will be $2.40 on and after March 1; nine months ago it was only 85 cents. The wholesale price of cut nails on March 1 will be $2.15; nine months ago it was only 70 cents.

Here is an increase of 182 per cent. in one case and of 207 per cent in the other. The price of the fundamental raw material, Bessemer pig iron, is now only 30 per cent. higher than it was when the nail ring began to put up its prices from the low level of 85 and 70 cents. But the combination absolutely controls the industry, and all those who buy or use nails must pay its price.

The nail manufacturers export nails at the rate of 25,000,000 pounds a year. The enormous increase of the prices exacted by the combination from consumers in the United States has not checked its export trade or reduced the quantity shipped abroad. We notice that in November last, the high prices now demanded here having then been exacted in the home market for two months, the exports were 2,311,065 pounds, or a quantity considerably exceeding the average monthly shipments. These facts show, of course, that the industry does not need a particle of tariff protection and ought not to have any.

The Republican party insists, in the Dingley-McKinley bill, upon increasing the present duty on nails of 15 per cent., partly upon the plea that the manufacture of nails is a "stricken and prostrate industry." It also promises to restore in 1898 the McKinley duty, which was equivalent to from $2.50 to $4 per keg.—New York Times, February 8, 1896.

Dingley Bill Taxes.

The Republican papers which are clamoring for the passage of the Dingley bill, and demanding what they call a free trade policy should be replaced by high protection, are careful not to tell their readers what the result of a 15 per cent. increase of duties would be. There are doubtless many persons who believe that the Wilson law reduced duties so low that with a trifling addition of 15 per cent. it would be only a moderate revenue tariff. Republicans who never read Democratic or independent papers might naturally suppose that we are now living under free trade, and that the Dingley bill is what it pretends to be, a measure for increasing custom revenues. A brief statement of the present duties on some important articles, and their comparison with the duties which would be imposed by the bill passed by the Republican House, will show how utterly mistaken is such a belief.

Prominent among the industries which are claimed to be suffering from the Democratic low tariff is that of making window glass. Yet the duty on most sizes of imported glass is now from 71 to 80 per cent. Under that duty the imports of foreign glass has greatly fallen off, showing that the domestic producer can supply the market without further protection. An increase of 15 per cent. in duties would raise the price of glass to American consumers at least to the amount of the duty, and probably more, for taxes of 81 to 102 per cent. would totally prohibit foreign competition and enable the glass trust to entirely control prices. Do the people who buy glass want to enrich a powerful trust by giving them a close monopoly.

Iron and steel beams, girders and all other forms of building material are protected by duties of 50 per cent. This tax is practically prohibitory, and a combination of steel manufacturers charges extortionate prices for the immense quantities of their products which are used every year. With 15 per cent. more protection the combination would increase prices accordingly. Is it a wise policy which would make houses, factories and stores cost more to their builders? Are the interests of a few steel makers of more importance than those of the millions who would be compelled to pay higher rents on account of dear building materials?

On cotton and woolen knitted goods, such as are used by every household in the country, there are now imposed duties of 50 per cent. This means that many poor people have to buy less of these goods than they would if the price was not made high enough through heavy custom taxes, and are, therefore, poorly clothed and protected against the cold. Do the fairminded American voters want the cost of these necessities of the masses increased by a 57 per cent. tariff duty?

These are examples of the way in which Republican legislation is designed to help a few protected interests at the expense o the whole country. Do the people really want higher duties and dearer goods? If not, their only remedy is to support the Democratic party and work for still lower prices and taxes.

A Whopper.

The Atlanta Constitution, which is ever on the lookout for anything that commands a protective tariff finds consolation in a long letter from a well known Republican correspondent in which it is contended that the prosperity of the South depends upon a high tariff. In this letter the following assertion is made:

"Labor in the South at the looms approaches in cheapness that of Japan."

The Constitution ought to know that this is a great big falsehood, a libel on the South. It should have exposed its fallacy, but because the statement is made the basis of a plea for protection the Constitution adopts it and puts it forth.

As a matter of fact the average wages of "labor at the looms" in the South are at least five times as great as the average of labor at the looms in Japan.

But if the wages were the same in both countries how would protection increase the wages of the cotton factory operative in the South? Wages are, on an average, better under the Wilson low tariff than they were under the McKinley high tariff, and there are more employes in our industries.

Wages are not increased by protective tariffs. There is free trade in labor all the while and no manufacturer pays a dollar more than the market rule.

The Constitution is not much when it comes to argument, but even it might produce a better plea for a protective tariff than it presents in Townsend's letter this morning, and if we remember correctly, not long ago the Constitution pretended to be frightened at the prospect that we were about to be ruined by the competition of Japan because labor was so much cheaper there. Now it lugs in a fellow to tell us that the wages "at the loom" are about the same in both countries. What, then, do we want protection against? Does the Constitution believe that the Japanese are so superior to our people in industry and ingenuity that at the same wages our labor cannot compete with theirs?

The fellow who argues for protection weaves a tangled web from the moment he begins his game of deception.—Atlanta Journal.

People are happy when yesterday seems twice as far away as to-morrow.

WOMAN'S WIT.

TOLD BY A SOCIETY GIRL.

Something About Morphine, Sulphur, Molasses and Other Things.

From the Evening News, Newark, N. J.

Among the popular society leaders in East Orange, N. J., Emma L. Stoll, a charming young maiden, stands in the foremost rank. She is of a lovable disposition and the light of the social set in which she moves. For two years she has been a sick girl from internal troubles peculiar to women, and having recently recovered, has given our reporter the following interesting account:

"Instead of improving under the care of my physician I became worse. For five weeks I was unable to get out of bed and about 6 o'clock each morning I suffered horribly. My lips were sore and lacerated from the marks of my teeth, for in my efforts to keep from screaming I sunk my teeth deep into my lips. At such times I rolled and tossed until the bed shook like an aspen leaf and it finally got so serious that the doctor—I won't tell you his name—gave me some morphine pills to take. The very thought of them now makes me shiver. These morphine pills simply put me to sleep for a while and when I became conscious again my agony was renewed.

"The pain in my stomach and back was more than I could stand. 'Your blood is poor,' said the doctor, 'take sulphur and molasses,' and I did until it was a great wonder that I was not a molasses cake. It was time wasted in taking it, because I was not benefited in the least; my suffering continued, but by a mighty effort after being in bed so long, I got up. Oh, but I was a sad sight then. From 112 pounds, I had fallen to ninety; my cheeks were pale and sunken and I limped; yes, actually hobbled from the extreme pain in my side. Then I read of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and the testimonial in the News inspired me with hope. I got the pills and took them. Before many days I began to improve and before I had finished one box I felt as if I could go out and walk for miles. I soon stopped limping and through the Pink Pills I soon bid good-bye to my headaches, while the pain in my stomach and back slowly but surely succumbed to the influence of these pills that seem to be able to persuade all pain to leave one's body. Now I am as I used to be; well and strong, light-hearted and merry, but never without the pills. See, I have got some of them now," and from a nearby desk she handed out one of the boxes.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills contain, in a condensed form, all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restores shattered nerves. They build up the blood, and restore the glow of health to pale and sallow cheeks. Pink Pills are sold in boxes at 50 cents a box or six boxes for 2.50, and may be had of all druggists, or direct by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Schenectady, N.Y.

Kinglake.

Kinglake, the author of "Eothen," was afflicted with gout, and he had a fancy to try a lady doctor, and wrote to one to ask if gout was beyond her scope. She replied: "Dear sir, gout is not beyond my score, but men are."

It was Kinglake who uttered one of the neatest of mots on the peculiar character of the Times. He had little fondness for that journal, in spite of personal friendships which might have been expected to soften his view of the question. The paper was still to him a sort of juggernaut, irresistable and fateful. On seeing an announcement of the new editor's marriage, he exclaimed: "Heavens! that brings the Times into relation with humanity."

Alligators.

The Indians of Central and South America firmly believe that alligators swallow stones for the purpose of making themselves heavier, and thus capable of diving more easily. From whatever cause, the fact is certain that alligators do swallow stones, it being rarely the case that a saurian is killed without one or more stones, sometimes of considerable size, being found in its stomach.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars; free.

New Kind of Bridge.

Experiments in crossing rivers have recently been made by the Austrian cavalry with water-tight haversacks filled with straw. Four of these were formed into a sort of raft, held together by three sabers; on these five men got astride, and the foremost steering with a pole, and the horses were led, swimming. It took eight minutes to pre are eight more to cross a river 550 feet wide and twelve feet deep and two minutes to resaddle on the opposite bank; so the five men were ready for action on the other side in eighteen minutes after the order to cross was given. Boats were also made with the haversacks, stiffened with iron bars or cavalry sabers, in which twelve or fourteen men were ferried over.

DAMMED ICE

A Big Gorge At The Niagara Falls, Stops The Flow Of Half That Mighty Cataract

Take notice that we have used no profanity in spelling the above head. If we had spelled it d——d it would have been different. But the facts are all the same anyway you choose to spell it. For a week or two and for the first time in half a century, the American side of Niagara Falls has been practically without a flow of water. The recently severe cold weather has been largely accountable for it, although the dry seasons of the past three years may have reduced to a small extent, the volume of water going over the Falls. But a week or so ago, a dam or gorge of ice was formed, extending from Schlosser's dock on the American side to Goat Island, so that a part of the time it was possible for a man to walk on a plank from the Mainland to Goat Island without wetting his feet, and also to walk between all the little islands in the group. At times, a man in knee boots could have walked across the brink of the Falls from Prospect Point to Goat Island, the water was so low. But the Canadian Fall was not interfered with as the deeper water on that side prevented the masses of ice from lodging against the rocks and so clogging the flow of water. In fact the water was probably all the deeper there, as that part that had usually gone over the American Fall, was compelled to find its way over by turning off above and going into the Canadian Channel. It was a queer condition of things for that mighty cataract. No one ever thought there was anything could ever check the steady flow of that vast body of tumbling, roaring water.

For $5.

A man never knows how many nice things he can get for $5 till he has a good chance to try it. The Huntington Democrat gives the following anecdote in proof of this:

A farmer of Lagro township, Wabash county, who is well known here, called on a gang of gypsies recently, who were camping three miles west of here, for the purpose of having his fortunate told. One of the gang told Mr. Farmer his fortune. But it turned out to be a sad one. The fortune teller told this tiller of the soil that his time on earth was of short duration; that a mule would kick him to death, which caused a great streak of sorrow and lamentations to come over this inquisitive man. When one of the women of the gang, who stood by and saw this man's grief, she told him that for five dollars she would tell him how to prevent this death blow from that mule. He quickly handed over a V, then the woman told him to stay away from the mule. It is hoped this tiller of the soil can see the point.

Black Snow.

Tuesday evening, Feb. 18 a black muddy looking snow fell at Chicago and throughout the country in that region. It was a strange thing and men of science at once set about studying the unusual phenomenon. Several lots of the snow were gathered up and examined and a number of them carefully analyzed. In general terms, they were found to contain some sort of dust, but which now, after melting the snow, mud, of course. The dust seemed to have been whisked up by the wind somewhere. It was even claimed by a few that it may have come from the alkali deserts in the west, as some of the particles resembled the alkali dust of the dry plains. Some thought it was dust and ashes blown out from some volcano. But this theory was soon rejected. At other points analyses were made with similar results. As near to us as Warsaw, the queer snow was noticed and the Times of that place published an account of an analysis made by a skillful physician of that place, which is probably as correct as any. It says:

The peculiar color of the snow that fell Tuesday night attracted the attention of every observer, and with others I was interested to the extent of making a careful examination of the phenomenon. I found the colored snow on the level to be one-half inch deep, but it was one and one-half inch where it laid in drifts. One ounce of the snow contained three and three-eights grains of solid matter composed of sand, lime, clay and other earthly substances. There were of organic matter the following articles: Diatoms, cow's hair, pollen of corn, pollen of willow, thistle-down, hair from nettle leaf, dandelion hair and a few fragments of clam shells. Many of these articles may have come from our own vicinity, while others must have come from a great distance, probably from Minnesota as the wind came from that direction. There was no soot—i. e., carbon—found in the deposit in this city or vicinity, as reported at Chicago, a strong evidence of the greater cleanliness and purity of our city."

It may be that this peculiar snow was noticed here, but we have not heard of it. It reminds one of the "red snows" that have often been noticed in various countries, and which have been attributed to similar causes. Then there are the showers of small frogs, fishes, etc, that have also occurred. These latter have not been well explained, the one most generally accepted, being that a sudden fierce storm or wind, scooped up the waters of some pond or small lake, and afterwards passing rapidly overhead threw down its catch of fish or frogs some distance away. But all these strange things are not fully accounted for. We only are sure that they now and then happen.

Field of Fairs

The regular annual meeting of the Ohio and Indiana Field of Fairs was held in the parlors of the Randall hotel in Fort Wayne on Tuesday, Feb. 18, 1896. The meeting was called to order by Hon. R. M. Lockhart, president.

The following fairs were represented.

Angola, Ind., fair by H. L. Hutson secretary.

Waterloo, Ind., fair by R. M. Lockhart.

Hicksville, O., fair by J. M. Ainsworth, president; J. E. Coburn, secretary; and G. W. Forder.

Kendallville, Ind., fair by J. B. Kimball, vice-president.

Ligonier, Ind., fair by J. H. Hoffman, secretary.

La Grange, Ind., fair by L. M. Rowe, secretary.

State fair by Hon. R. M. Lockhart.

Representatives of the Butler street fair were expected, but failed to appear and their date is not known.

The election of officers for the ensuing year resulted in the re-election of R. M. Lockhart for president and J. S. Coughlin, secretary, both by acclamation. It was decided to hold the next meeting of the field at Waterloo, the time to be determined by the president and secretary as heretofore.

The following dates were made for holding the fairs of 1896:

Waterloo, Ind.,	September	1.
Hicksville, O.,	"	7.
State Fair,	"	14.
LaGrange, Ind.,	"	14.
Montpelier, O.	"	21.
Ligonier, Ind.,	"	21,
Kendallville, Ind.,	"	28.
Angola, Ind.,	October	5.

FRANK LESLIE'S POPULAR MONTHLY FOR MARCH.

The great "Lee of Virginia" series, in Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly, is continued in the March number with a picturesque and superbly illustrated paper devoted to Major General Henry Lee, of Revolutionary fame. This is "the dashing dragoon and splendid orator, the chosen of Patrick Henry and the beloved of Washington, classic scholar and impassioned patriot, brilliant scion of a long-distinguished race, Governor of his native State, and perfect type of the Virginia gentleman, rearing his sons in religion, morality and learning, solicitous above all that they should be taught to ride, shoot and tell the truth—General Henry Lee, the 'Light Horse Harry' of his earlier contemporaries, and the father of General Robert E. Lee." Other illustrated articles in the March Frank Leslie's are: "The New South," by the Hon. John Y. Foster; "In Old Virginia," by Kate Mason Rowland; "A Winter in Lombardy," by Lena L. Pepper; "Woman's Work and Ministrations," by Alvan S. Southworth; "The Memory of Robert Burns," by Margaret E. Leicester Addison; "Society Plays Golf," by Diana Crossways; and "A Winter Vagary," by William Potts of "Underledge." Among the contributors of fiction and poetry are Anna Katharine Green, Cleveland Moffett, Frances Swann Williams, Chas. Edwards, Henry Tyrrell and Georgia Roberts.

Ten-Centers.

For some days the lads in Auburn have been discussing the "ten cent pieces of 1894." Just how the thing got started we don't know, but it started somewhere, and the idea has taken fast hold of the boys that a ten cent piece of that date has a fabulous value. They have been on the hunt for such a piece every day since the fad started. If you ask one of the boys, they will either say that Charlie Glazier started it, or that Mr. Zent put them on the track. One report has it that Glazier got one of the sought-for 94-sters, and turned it over to a collector of coins for $100. Then followed the story that either Glazier or Zent would give $50 for each and every one of these pieces that could be brought to them. Quite recently a lad brought Mr. Zent, so the story goes, a ten cent piece of the '94 issue and wanted the expected $50. Zent made some excuse, that he hadn't the change just then, or had put on the wrong pants that morning, or some such reason, and sent the young financier to Glazier. Just how he succeeded with the latter we have not been able to learn. But the columns of the DAILY are open to further developments.

The Great Tobacco War

From The New York Herald.

The head of the largest St. Louis manufacturies of plug tobacco said to-day: About two years ago we put on the market a brand of plug tobacco, and when we figured it out, we found we had lost just seven cents a pound. Battle Ax Plug Tobacco, I am told, sells for one cent per pound less than our brand, which would make the loss on it nine cents per pound. "Battle Ax," however, is superior to the one we put out, and must cost more to manufacture. Twenty million pounds of Battle Ax plug tobacco were sold, on which I believe there must have been a loss of at least ten cents a pound, so on this item alone there seems to have been a loss of $2,000,000.

From the above statement of a large plug tobacco manufacturer, who evidently knows what he is talking about, it would seem to us that the only one who is benefiting by the Tobacco War is the man who chews "Battle Ax," for he is certainly getting the full worth of his money every time he buys it.

National Holiday

A Mistaken Impression Prevails On This Subject.

The Chicago Chronicle has a timely article on this important subject and we quote it in full.

There is pending in the senate of the United States a proposition to make the birthday of Abraham Lincoln a national holiday. Notice was also given by Senator Hill that he would move that the birthday of Andrew Jackson should also be made a national holiday.

If any power resided in the national legislature to make holidays they would be as plentiful presently as saints' days in South America. But congress has never yet assumed to make a national holiday and it is not likely to go extensively into legislation of that character. It must be obvious that Lincoln's birthday is not celebrated in a broad, patriotic manner, but is seized upon by partisans of the republican party of high taxation for the purpose of eulogizing not the president who was killed, but of exploiting themselves and their party. They pervert the common schools to a like purpose.

It has been considered by congress always that legislation for holidays must be made by the states themselves. The Fourth of July is a holiday by common consent, not by national enactment. The president of the United States proclaims Thanksgiving day, but that proclamation is without avail unless it is followed in the state by the proclamation of the governor thereof. Christmas was a holiday before the foundation of the republic and will probably continue to be a holiday when the republic will have passed away. Even the puritan now recognizes it.

But congress has never created a national holiday by enactment.

It was given out recently that labor had been honored by the creation of a national holiday. We may see how far this is true by the precise words of the enactment itself. "That the first Monday of September in each year, being the day celebrated and known as labor's holiday, is hereby made a legal public holiday, to all intents and purposes, in the same manner as Christmas, the first day of January, the twenty-second day of February, the thirtieth day of May and the fourth day of July are now made by law public holidays."

To ascertain how far this legislation operated we must turn to previous legislation regarding the days named in this enactment. The latest national enactment upon the subject was on Jan., 31, 1879, and it so amended the revised statutes of the United States for the District of Columbia as to make the twenty-second day of February a holiday within that district. The text was: "That section 993 of the revised statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia be and the same is hereby amended by adding to the days therein declared to be holidays within the district the twenty-second day of February, and such a day shall be a holiday for all the purposes mentioned in said section. Provided, that this act shall not apply to the twenty-second day of February, 1879." It will be seen, therefore, that Labor day is as much a national holiday as is the twenty-second day of February. The twenty-second day of February is through national legislation a holiday only within the District of Columbia. Section 993, amended in order to include the twenty-second day of February, provides that "the following days, namely, the first day of January, commonly called New Year's day; the fourth day of July; the twenty-fifth day of December, commonly called Christmas day, and any day appointed or recommended by the president of the United States as a day of public fast or thanksgiving, shall be holidays within the district, and shall for all purposes of presenting for payment or acceptance, for the maturity and protest and giving notice of the dishonor of bills of exchange, bank checks and promissory notes or other negotiable or commercial paper, be treated and considered as is the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

Herein lies all that the United States have undertaken regarding national holidays. They have made Labor day a holiday as far as Washington's birthday is now made by law a public holiday. If they should make Lincoln's birthday a national holiday it will be a national holiday only as to the District of Columbia.

That holiday is no holiday which is not a holiday by common consent. Enactments cannot make holidays save for banks.

SURPRISE

At least it was to be a surprise and was such to a considerable extent, but our friend Abram Sherck smelled a rat, somewhat, and was not as near "Struck out" as he might have been. He resides a few miles east of town, and Feb. 15, was 50 years old. So his good neighbors and friends, over forty of them, filled up a score of baskets with good things and suddenly appeared at his home. A good time followed, and all went home happy. Mr. Sherck and his wife Sarah E. Sherck feel well pleased at the good will shown by their neighbors on this occasion, and hope these pleasant relations may always continue.

A Word For Cal.

The DeKalb County Lecturer Is Highly Complimented by the Press.

The COURIER has frequently spoken of the success of Cal Housel man as a lecturer before the Farmers Institutes. He is receiving very flattering press notices wherever he appears. He lectured at South Bend last week and the Times says the following:

Cal. Housel man addressed the meeting on the subject of "The best acre; garden and small fruits." He opened the address by making a slap at those who took the institute as a good place in which to make semi political remarks and other things that had only a place in political caucuses. He deprecated anything of that kind. These meetings were emphatically for the farmers, and political matters should be entirely eliminated."

His remarks were to the point and heartily applauded. The subject was then taken up and discussed in all its bearings. He wanted an acre for small fruits on every farm, desired plenty of fruit. It was better than most anything else. We have the soil and everything else necessary for the production of plenty of the fruit. He wanted a flower bed for the women to take care of, but the acre for a small fruits should be taken care of by the men. The land was necessary to be well prepared; make good selection of fruits; would recommend a large variety suitable only to the soil. He gave many laughable incidents and kept the attention of the audience to end."

Harry Hallam Weds

A Herald Man Secures a Bryan, Ohio Lady And Returns Home.

(Anderson Herald.)

Harry T. Hallam, foreman of the job department of the Herald office, and Miss Marie Myers, were married at the home of the bride's parents in Bryan, Ohio, Sunday afternoon. They arrived in the city yesterday, and will for the present reside at 138 North Clark street.

Mr Hallam left last Friday ostensibly for a visit with relatives at his old home, keeping his plans very quiet thinking to surprise his friends on his return. His secret, however, became known and congratulations were awaiting them on their arrival.

Harry has many friends in Auburn who will join with the COURIER in congratulations.

Indiana University.

In this issue appears an article that gives an interesting account of student life at Indiana University. This institution was established at Bloomington in 1820, and from its halls have gone many men whose reputations are national.

In 1885 the total attendance was 138. The attendance for the Fall and Winter terms for this year indicate that the enrollment for the year will exceed eight hundred. Thus in ten years the attendance has increased over five hundred per cent. Of the ninety-two counties in Indiana eighty-seven are represented this term.

The University is pre-eminently the child of the State, and its career is being watched by the people with an ever increasing interest and loyalty. The article in to-day's issue gives a faithful portrayal of life at the institution and a general description of the buildings and grounds.

Frank Leslie's Pleasant Hours For Boys And girls

The first of a series of articles on "The Young People of the White House," by Joanna R. Nicholls, is given, with numerous illustrations, in the March number of Frank Leslie's Pleasant Hours For Boys And Girls. This number has many other good things that will delight its youthful readers, among them a short boating story by James Otis; a very pretty cat show story by Rosalie M. Jones; thrilling account of "A Wild Whirl Down the Locks," by J. Macdonald Oxley; the second paper of Frank Lee Farnell's interesting series on "The Favorite Story-writers for Young People," in which are given portraits of Horatio Alger, jr. James Otis and Sophia Swett; an article on "Dainty Work for Girls," by Lilian Graham Alliger; a bright little story by Helen Fortune Berger; the conclusion of the two serials by Edward S. Ellis and Jeannette H. Walworth; some illustrated poems; two new games; a chat on juvenile literature by the editor; and a number of prize puzzles.

A Valuable Prescription.

Editor Morrison of Worthington, Ind. "Sun" says: "You have a valuable prescription in Electric Bitters, and I can cheerfully recommend it for constipation and sick headache, and as a general system tonic it has no equal." Mrs. Annie Stehle, 2625 Cottage Grove Ave. Chicago was all run down, could not eat nor digest food, had backache which never left her, and felt tired and weary, but six bottles of Electric Bitters restored her health and renewed her strength. Nervous Prostration

Cured by Dr. Miles' Nervine.

Prolonged derangement of the nervous system not only affects the brain and mental powers, but develops disease in some of the vital organs. The most dangerous of these indirect results is when the heart is affected. This was the case of the Rev. N. P. Surface, Fawn River, Mich., who writes under date of Feb. 14, 1895:

"Fourteen years ago I had a slight stroke of paralysis. Overwork brought on nervous prostration. I was exceedingly nervous and the exertion of public speaking caused heart palpitation that threatened my life. I used two bottles of Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure for my heart trouble, and two of Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine for my nervousness and feel better than I ever expected to feel again. I can speak for hours without tiring or having my heart flutter as it formerly did, and I have you to thank that I am alive today."

Queer Pension Case.

An Ohio item, dated Wooster Feb. 21, is as strange a case as ever came to our knowledge, and even the Pension Department, has not had one of the sort before. It says:

Although a small tombstone in a southern burial ground has for over thirty years recorded the fact that Lorenzo D, Forker was dead, he did not pass away until last night in this city. The story is an interesting one. In 1862 Mr Forker, with others, was mustered into Given post, G. A. R, although he had no discharge, but it was known that he had been a member of Company F, Thirtieth regiment, I. V. I.

Some years ago Forker lost a leg, and for several years has been in poor circumstances. Early in January a letter was written to see why he could not be placed on the pension rolls. Information from the office of the adjutant general of Indiana was to the effect that the records showed that Forker had died in a hospital in 1863.

The post, on receiving this information immediately dropped his name from the roster. Mr. Forker, on being confronted with the documents, confessed the truth. To a friend he stated that he was sick at the time and when a man who was on a cot near him died he bribed the nurse to give his name as the one who was dead.

Mr. Forker came to this city shortly after the war and was repeatedly elected to office, being township clerk at the time of his death. A sad feature of Mr. Forker's act is that some unknown soldier's name appears on the records as a deserter, and his wife is unable to prove her claim for a pension.

Colleges Unite.

A wise thing has been done by the several colleges in Indianapolis, that have always heretofore been kept up as separate institutions. A late dispatch says:

Butler (literary) college, the Medical College of Indiana, the Indiana Dental college and the Indiana Law school amalgamated to day by the action of representatives from each institution. The name of the new college is the University of Indianapolis. Other departments will be added and a complete educational institution is contemplated by the organizers on broad non-sectrian grounds. Each department will at present preserve its autonomy with a dean at the head of each. The university starts with 1,000 students. Legislative action, authorizing closer union will be asked.

Trustee's Meeting

The township trustees of the county have organized themselves into an association. They had a meeting to-day We have no report of the work done, except that Supt. Merica took advantage of the occasion to hand them out the enumeration and transfer blanks, and to explain to them their duty under the new law and the recent decisions of the supreme court.

Freak Killed

The strangest cause of murder ever recorded is reported this week from Union town in Alabama. The dispatch says:

Joseph Brohem of San Antonio, Tex., a freak with five tongues, three chins and ears twenty inches in lengh, was on his way to the train to leave the city. A crowd of boys followed him at a distance, frightened at his appearance, it being whispered among the negroes that he was the devil himself. Simonton, a little braver than the rest, approached nearer. He carried for protection an ax handle. Brohem was annoyed by the boys and suddenly faced about. As Simonton caught the full hideousness of Brohem's countenance he was frightened beyond description, and striking the freak with an ax handle, fled, no one knows where. Brehem died almost immediately. His body was brought here to-night and will be reduced to a mummy state by a local undertaker.

Back To The Pen

Warden Harly of the Michigan City prison came to Muncie to night after Thomas Lee who was released Wednesday, two months ahead of time. In receiving Lee, Warden French wrote the word "May," the time Lee was received, "Mar," and it was mistaken for March While en route here to be released, Lee told Sheriff Sherry that a mistake had been made and the prison officials were notified, discovering the error.

ROYAL Baking Powder. Highest of all in leavening strength.—U. S. Government Report.

Jim-Jams.

A stranger had a bad case of delirium tremens at the Junction Monday night. He was found lying on the B. & O. track just before the fast train came through and would certainly have been killed had he not been discovered. He was taken to the passenger station, and a comfortable place fixed for him to lie. But after appearing to be quiet for a short time, he bounded up with a yell like a Sioux Indian and jumped through the window without regard to expense for glass and sash and disappeared. He may be running yet. All this is not very complimentary on the quality of whisky on tap at the Junction.

DeKalb Pensions.

O. H. Widney, who is extensively engaged in the pension business in the east part of the county, has recently succeeded in making glad the hearts of two old veterans. About a week ago he got a raise of pension for Jake Bressler of Newville township from a rate of $16 to $30 This morning he was notified that he had succeeded in raising Jerry Ulm's pension from $12 to $17 a month, We are glad to hear that these two men get a lift under this administration.

By Telephone.

The Cuban insurgents recently captured a small town and the commander telephoned to the head officer of the Spanish fort in the suburbs that if he would surrender by telephone the insurgents would be saved the little bother of marching out to the fort and capturing that also. After discussing the matter pro and con over the telephone, the two opposing commanders reached an amicable conclusion and the fort surrendered. At least this is the report sent out. Great is the telephone in war or peace —Electrical Student.

Reasons Why.

There are many reasons why people should become residents of Auburn. And among the many important reasons, one is that, no town in the state of Indiana is so situated as to form a junction for traveling salesmen to meet, They come from Chicago, Fort Wayne, Jackson, Detroit, Defiance, and our city forms the junction or center. Here the traveling men meet and competition is so strong that they must make very low prices in order to sell any of their goods in Auburn. And this fact is not only true in the grocery business, but in all others. The idea that some people have that goods can be bought for less money in other cities is a mistaken idea. It may be true of some small places located within a few miles of a large city. But it is not true of Auburn, This fact has been demonstrated in many ways. A groceryman remarked to a COURIER representative recently that the one item of oranges alone were 10 cents higher on the dozen in Ft. Wayne than in Auburn. It seems queer that this should be true, when the wholesale houses are located there. While in that city yesterday we took occasion to look up this matter and went into the big store, so well known as the Fruit House. Here we saw naval oranges marked at 30 cents a dozen and they were not nearly so large as our merchants sell for 25 cents, And at another place we saw navel oranges which were some larger and sold at 50 cents a dozen. We have often heard the remark that groceries and general merchandise were much cheaper in Auburn than in other cities of a similar size. It has often been proven so to parties who are in the habit of trading away from home We believe that all of our merchants should emphasize this one reason why goods are sold cheaper in Auburn than any other places, including the big cities. The old saying "Competition is the life of trade," has many times been proven true in Auburn and especially is it true of the traveling salesmen who come together here representing wholesale houses from every direction. They must sell low if they do any business.

Grant's Monument.

New York City is very slow. They wanted Grant to be burried in that City, and they were to furnish a grand monument. It will take them ten years at the rate they have been going, Their last meeting showed total receipts, $515,112.07; total disbursements, $296,720.36; cash on hand, $233,202.55. The funds on hand will be just sufficient to complete the monument. The entire granite work will be finished in June next. The marble lining in the main structure and crypt, the stairways, interior decorations carving and the sarcophagus will be completed in about a year from this date and if no extraordinary delays occur the structure will be entirely finished and ready to receive the remains of General Grant and to be dedicated upon the anniversary of his birth, April 27, 1897.

TO THE SUFFERERS OF RHEUMATISM

After using Groff's Rheumatic Cure for some time in my practice I take great pleasure in saying that it is a most wonderful remedy for Rheumatism; in fact, it is the only one I have found for the cure of this disease in all its various form. Dr. E. E. Tull, Chicago.

Sensible.

The great gravel road case took a little different turn, after we went to press yesterday. Then, with about 80 witnesses who had been called, they had agreed to use only five on each side. Now, they have come to the conclusion that there on each side would be plenty. This is sensible, and much cost could have been saved from the start, had the matter been left to the six men's testimony. They are among the leading men of that section. The remonstrants have the first inning and had already put on Chris Curie and trustee John Henderson their last being Solomon Shilling, who was on the stand at 11 this forenoon. The witnesses on the defense, that is for the petitioners, as chosen, are O. H. Widney and his brother, S. L. Widney and Hon. S, S. Shutt. If six men as good as these can't settle a question, we don't know who could. We heard a part of Mr. Shilling's testimony. He is well posted in general, and of course believes the gravel road would be of little benefit. He was asked to give the probable value of all the farms near him, which he did readily, putting the price at $25 to $35 an acre and when asked about the probable increase of value from a gravel road along the line contemplated, put the benefits, if any at from 25 to 50 cents an acre. Some lands that did not face well on any road, he said would receive no benefits. The petitioners, on the other hand, will likely put the value of land higher, as well as the benefits. We have gained the idea, that they will claim a benefit of $2 to $3 an acre for good farms lying right on the gravel road, and then dimmish as the distance increases. At a distance of one and a half to one and three quarters of a mile they will probably fix the benefit at about five cents an acre, so that a man with forty acres would have to pay, $2, and with an eighty-acre farm, $4, and so on to the higher rates for farms nearer the road to be improved. The commissioners will have to weigh all this opposite testimony to get their decision. Commissioner Henderson does not sit on the board with the rest, as a part of his comes within the two-mile limit. So the agreeable job will be left for commissioners Bateman and Hague. If they are not able to agree it will be a bad case of "hung jury." We hope, however, they can agree, so the expensive suit will be finished.

Jail Delivery.

SOUTH BEND, Ind., Feb. 27.—The boldest jail delivery in the history of northern Indiana occurred here sometime during last night and was discovered when the cells of the county jail were opened at breakfast time, Six prisoners are missing, and are still at large. The bold crooks sawed through the top of a cell and gained the roof and then descended by a rope made of twisted blankets. The escaped prisoners were: Bert and Will Anderson, brothers; Thomas Clark, John Hempstall, Will Capill and Thomas McHenry. The former were awaiting trial for a wholesale robbery and an attempt to murder. The others were awaiting trials for serious crimes. Hempstall recently served 14 years in prison.

The town is greatly excited over the wholesale delivery of prisoners and every man available is giving chase. Telegrams have been sent in every direction to head off the crooks and it is hoped that they will not all escape.

Silver Price.

Silver seems to be slightly gaining in price. An ounce is now worth 70 cents, It probably pays a good profit to mine it at this price as it is used so extensively in the arts, etc., as well as for money that it readily sells as soon as made. In some mines, the lead that is found with it, is enough to pay the entire cost of mining, and the silver is clear gain. When silver gets to be worth $1.29 an ounce silver in a dollar will be of the same value as the gold in a gold dollar. In other words, silver will have to be almost double its present price. Of course the silver dollar is kept up to the value of a gold dollar, not because the metal is of equal value, but because the amount of silver coined is limited, and also because the silver may be indirectly redeemed in gold. It is such conditions as these, that will keep our coin money of equal or nearly equal values. It is not likely that with free coinage of silver this party could be maintained.

Marvelous Results.

From a letter written by Rev. J. Gunderman, of Dimondale, Mich., we are permitted to make this extract: "I have no hesitation in recommending Dr. King's New Discovery, as the results were almost marvelous in the case of my wife. While I was pastor of the Baptist church at Rives Junction she was brought down with pneumonia succeeding lagrippe Terrible paroxysms of coughing would last hours with little interuption and it seemed as if she could not survive them A friend recommended Dr. King's New Discovery; it was quick in its work and highly satisfactory in its work and highly satisfactory in results." New Job Press

The Courier Job Rooms Will Have One of the Best Made.

J. C. Lochner of the COURIER was at Chicago Saturday and at Fort Wayne Monday and again yesterday, and at the latter place purchased of the Newspaper Union a new "Jones-Gordon" job press for the COURIER job rooms. It will arrive to-morrow morning and after a few hours will be in running order. It is one of the very latest style presses with all improvements. No other office in DeKalb county can boast of a better job press than the COURIER. It will enable us to do even better job printing than in the past and any of our readers who need any printing will find the work done to their entire satisfaction. This with other improvements, which you will notice within the next week, have cost us several hundred dollars and we hope our business men and patrons will appreciate our efforts in giving them nothing but the best, and give us a liberal share of your patronage. When the press is set up we invite our friends in to see it work.

The Tramp.

There are tramps and tramps, as everybody knows. Several have been in Auburn this week, some being abroad even in the severe weather of last week. This fact made it seem all right, when last evening just after dark, a sound looking man tapped at the rear door of L. E. Gregg's residence. Mrs. Gregg went to the door, and was accosted in a strong Irish brogue, with the words, "Please mum, will ye give a poor mon a bit of something to ate? I haven't had a mouthful fer forrty-eight hours." The tones of the hungry man went to the kind heart of the good housewife, and she told him she would give him a lunch The poor tramp remained at the door, in humble plight while Mrs, Gregg was preparing the food. She took some large pieces of bread, and gave them a plentiful spread of good butter. Mr. Gregg noticed the bread, and called out to her, to "Give the poor fellow some of that nice fried potato, spread between the slices, also." The waiting tramp heard this last kind remark, and could wait no longer. He opened the door and stood before them. It was their near neighbor Vee Zimmerman. This little incident adds one more to his laurels as a successful mimic.

Paymaster.

Gen. Samuel M. Compton, Quartermaster General of Indiana, is an applicant for appointment in the Pay Department of the U. S. Army as Major and Paymaster. A petition has been sent to Capt. A. L. Kuhlman to be presented to the members of the militia and citizens to be signed to assist Gen. Compton to this appointment. He has many warm friends in the Indiana Legion, and it was through him that it was brought up to its present high standard of efficiency.

He especially has many friends among the Auburn Rifles as he invited the boys to a first class restaurant before their departure from Hammond during the strike and let each partake of a fine lunch. After dieting on army food for two weeks, a treat like that will never be forgotten.

Telephone Exchange

Charles F. Taylor of Ft. Wayne is in the city for a few days looking up the matter of establishing a telephone here. He is calling on business men and others who would be likely to take an interest in the matter, and has so far been very successful in getting subscribers for telephones. If he gets fifty subscribers the exchange will be established. The price charged will be $2.50 a month for business houses and offices, and $1.50 a month for private dwellings. They are putting in a new plant at Ft. Wayne and if we succeed in getting an exchange here, we will soon have connection with Ft. Wayne, thus giving us a complete system. The matter will likely be settled one way or the other in a few days. Auburn should settle down on some plan or system soon, as there are many advantages in having the use of a telephone in every day business.

NOT TILL 1904

Persons who were born on this day, Feb. 29th will not have another anniversary of their birth for 8 years, or until 1904. All years exactly divisible by 4 are leap years, except centennial years, which must be divisible by 400 and so that year will not be a leap year, and February will not again have 29 days until the year 1904.

ELECTRIC BITTERS.

Electric Bitters is a medicine suited for any season, but perhaps more generally needed in the Spring, when the languid exhausted feeling prevails, when the liver is torpid and sluggish and the need of a tonic and alterative is felt. A prompt use of this medicine has often averted long and perhaps fatal bilious fevers. No medicine will act more surely in counteracting and freeing the system from the malarial poison. Headache, Indigestion, Constipation. Dizziness yield to Electric Bitters. Only fifty cents per bottle at Robbins & McCord's Drug Store. 1

Mr. C. A. SCHAAB is Our Buyer.

He went to the City early Monday morning. Can't tell just when he will return.

He had arranged to meet a number of buyers from other towns and cities.

They have been shopping together.

Buying large quantities for cash gets the right stuff and much lower prices than ordinary.

We will give you the benefit of our good management.

The new goods will begin to arrive tomorrow.

FRIGHTFUL EXPLOSION.

The Victims Hurled Hundreds of Feet and Dashed to Pieces.

The boiler at W. H. Overholt's sawmill, near Frankfort, W. Va., exploded, tearing the mill to pieces and killing five men. The dead are Samuel Livesay, Harry Brown, Henry Dunbar, Woodson Bansberger, and Samuel Hodges. "Kell" Livesay and Clowney Kershner are fatally injured and their death is momentarily expected, while James Fleishman and Homer McClintick are seriously hurt. All are highly respected young men of Greenbriar, W. Va. The two men whose death is expected were frightfully mangled, their limbs being broken and their flesh pressed out of semblance to human beings. Sam Hodges was blown nearly a thousand feet and dashed against a tree, while another of those dead was wrapped around a stump several hundred feet from the scene of the explosion.

Confessed to Killing Two Old People

The trial of Charles Morris, charged with murdering Jonathan Deuthett and wife, and burning them in their home, near Xenia, Ohio, in 1886, was begun last week. A confession by Morris while in the penitentiary for burglary, made to Dr. Park, was presented to the jury, and made quite a sensation. Morris was tried for the killing of one of the old people at the time and was acquitted, and this trial is for the killing of Mrs. Douthett. The trial is attracting widespread attention.

Another Massacre Feared.

London special: The Anglo-Armenian Association has received a telegram from Constantinople which says that 3,000 Armenians have been massacred at Arabkir, and that the widows and orphans of those killed are in terrible distress from cold and hunger. The dispatch also says that the Armenians of Sivas and Cesarea are in daily fear of massacre. Forced conversions to Islamism are general throughout the Asiatic provinces.

Filibusterers Convicted.

J. H. Wyborg, Jans Peterson and H. Joansen, the late captain, first mate and second mate of the steamer Horsa, were convicted in the United States district court at Philadilphia, of engaging in a Cuban filibustering expedition. Counsel for the defendants gave notice that they would make application for a new trial, and pending a disposition of this move, sentence was suspended.

Two Villains Strung up By a Mob.

Paul and Gibert Frances were lynched by a mob at Convent, St. James Parish, La. A few nights ago they attempted to burglarize M. G. Gourge's residence. Gourge was knocked down and rendered unconscious, and when his wife came to his assistance she was dragged to the yard and assaulted. Next day the villains were arrested, Paul confessing.

Two Children Burned.

Two children of Howard Allen at Shanghai, Ind., were burned to death recently. They were 2 and 4 years old. The mother left them in the house alone with locked doors. They were playing with matches. The fatality was in the same house where James Gregory was assassinated by Horace Loomis a year ago.

A Tramp with Big Money.

A rather seedy looking individual, who gave his name as Bernard Fitzpatrick, and his home as Altoona, Pa., was arrested at Toledo, recently, as a vagrant. In a belt he had on was found $1,814 in bank notes and coin. He is being held pending an investigation. He claims the money represents his earnings.

Plucky Youngster.

Charles Rhodes, aged 9, of West Salem, Ohio, while shooting at a mark, accidentally shot himself in the bowels with his father's revolver. He didn't tell his parents, but when they saw him draw up his limbs in apparent agony he said: "There is a hole in my body." He will hardly recover.

Hunter Withdraws.

Dr. Hunter has issued a card withdrawing from the senatorial race in Kentucky. He briefly reviews the events of the contest, reaffirms his allegiance to the Republican party, and assures the Republican members of the Legislature that their choice shall have his cordial support.

Drowned While Cutting Ice.

Clay Ball, 18 years old, living east of Liberty, Ind., was drowned while assisting his father in cutting ice.

A Terrible Tragedy.

A terrible tragedy took place in Hancock County, Tenn. Hiram Price killed his wife and his mother-in-law and chopped the hand off the nurce while she was running away with his child. An ax was the weapon used. A posse is now pursuing the murderer.

Pinched to Death.

Wm. C. Rippel, aged 25, a brakeman on the C., L. & W. Railroad, while coupling at Canal Dover, Ohio, was caught between the deadwoods and pinched so severely that he died.

Fire at Port Huron.

The large dry goods house of Meisel Bros., at Port Huron, Mich., was completely destroyed by fire. The building was valued at $20,000 and the stock at $50,000. Both are a total loss. The fire is supposed to have originated from the crossing of electric light wires. The firemen were crippled by not having proper apparatus.

Father and Son Drowned.

L. Rucker, aged 45, and his son, aged 10, were drowned at Cliffside Park skating pond near Catlettsburg, Ky. Young Rucker was skating, and the ice gave way. His father, who was near, in trying to rescue him was also drowned. Their bodies were found about an hour later.

BANKS RAIDED.

A Director and Cashier Dead and Others Wounded.

A special from Wichita Falls, Texas, says: Two robbers entered the City National Bank of that city at 2:45 o'clock the other afternoon and demanded the money of Cashier Dorsey, who resisted them. Shooting began, resulting in the death of Cashier Frank Dorsey and the wounding of Bookkeeper P. P. Langford. Langford's wounds are not serious, being light flesh wounds. The robbers secured only a few hundred dollars in silver. They then mounted their horses and made a run for their lives. By this time many of the citizens had armed themselves and a small battle took place. One of the robbers was wounded. He mounted behind his partner and about a mile from town met a farmer in a buggy. They took his horse and made a break for the hills. In the meantime the citizens had secured horses and at last reports were within a quarter of a mile of the robbers with good prospects of overtaking them.

Warren (Ark.) special: A daring and desperate attempt at bank robbery occurred at 3 o'clock the other afternoon. The robbers failed to get any money, but the brave cashier, Mr. Adair, lies dangerously wounded, and Mr. T. M. Goodwin, a leading citizen, merchant, and bank director, is dead.

HANGED THE ROBBERS.

Two Desperadoes Meet With Summary Punishment.

Wichita Falls (Tex.) special: The two men who tried to rob the Citizens' National bank and killed Cashier Dorsey, were captured and brought to this city and lodged in jail. A large crowd immediately gathered and threats were freely made of lynching. The jail was guarded by two companies of Texas ragers, under command of the famous Capt. McDonald. One of the robbers proved to be a noted outlaw, Foster Crawford, and his companion is a farmer from near here. He is known by the name of "The Kid."

At night a mob took them to a telegraph pole in front of the bank they tried to rob, and hanged them both. The rangers, a few hours before the hanging, got a sudden call to Amarillo and left the men in charge of a few citizens who immediately turned them over to the mob.

There are some peculiar things connected with this robbery. Several days ago Dorsey, cashier of the robbed bank received information that a plan was on foot to rob the bank, and informed President Kemp of the same. "If the bank is robbed, I will be killed and I know it," he said. President Kemp laughed at him, but at his urgent request guards were stationed for some time over the bank, but after some little time they were withdrawn.

SPANISH ATROCITIES.

Innocent Men Massacred at Guatao by Spanish Soldiers.

Senator Morgan has received the following telegram from Tampa, Fla:

"Senator Morgan: In Guatao seven miles from the suburbs of Havana, on Saturday, February 22, at half past two o'clock the insurgents retired from the town. A 6 o'clock 300 Spanish soldiers entered, murdering non-combatants to the number of twenty-two among whom were Spaniards and even sick men, a boy of 15 and an old man of 72. The violation of young girls were only prevented through the protest of Spanish residents. Fifteen innocent non-combatants have been taken to Mariano for trial. This news has been received through letters from reliable parties and since confirmed by witnesses who have just arrived from the scene of butchery.

Indiana Prohibitionists.

The Indiana Prohibitionists State convention met at Indianapolis and nominated the following ticket:

Governor—Rev. E. G. Shouse, Vigo County.
Lieutenant Governor—J. G. Kingsbury, Marion.
Secretary of State—J. E. Ellsworth, Adams.
Auditor of State—H. C. Hanson, Lake.
Treasurer—Sylvester Johnson, Marrion.
Attorney-General—S. M. Saylor, Huntington.
Statistician—J. E. Woodard, Parks.
Reporter Supreme Court—V. P. Kirk, Marshall.
Superintendent Public Instruction—C. W. Hodgin, Wayne.

State of Trade.

R. G. Dun & Co. says in their Weekly Review of Trade:

"In some quarters business gains at the West, rather than at the East, but there is no general change for the better, although hopefulness still predominates. Foreign affairs grow more pacific, public opinion turns more resolutely toward sound money, but the want of sufficient demand for the products of great industries still retards actual improvement. Strikes of some importance in garment making and kindred lines affect trade in Chicago and Baltimore, but there are fewer labor difficulties than usual, as existing conditions warn wage earners that controversies at this time are unwise. Speculative markets show little life.

Two Explosions.

A chemical mixture exploded in the dry room of the Dayton Cleaning and Repairing Company's works on Fourth street, Dayton, Ohio. Michael Dillon, the chemist, who was in the room at the time, was severely burned about the head, face, and arms. When the fire department arrived and threw water on the flames a second explosion occurred. P. J. Maloney was knocked from the top of a ladder and broke his left knee cap. Adam Nixon, another fireman, who had just entered the room, was painfully burned about the face and arms. It is feared that Dillon and Nixon inhaled the fire and that both are internally injured.

Visited by Fire.

A special from Charleston, S. C., says: The town of Florence, in the center of the State, was visited by a $100,000 fire. The entire business portion of the town was wiped out. The insurance on the property burned will amount to about $50,000. George Williams, a printer, whose home was in Darlington, was cremated. He was asleep in one of the destroyed buildings. Every building from the Central Hotel on Evans street to W. J. Brown's store, on Dargan street, was swept away. The State liquor dispensary and the Western Union telegraph office are also destroyed.

Didn't Scare.

At Marion, Ohio, the other night Orlando Deweiss escorted a young lady to her home. As he was returning a man stepped in front of him and, pointing a pistol at his face, said: "Your money or your life." The command was obeyed by a ball from a 38-caliber revolver, which entered the breast of the man who had ordered the money or life. The wounded man, a chum of the man who did the shooting, is Verge Everly, who, in company with two other companions, wanted to scare Deweiss. Everly cannot live.

Only Three Hours for Murdering a Boy.

Miss Elizabeth Flagler, daughter of Gen. Flagler, Chief of Ordnance, United States army, who about a year ago shot and killed a colored boy, who was stealing pears from her father's garden in Washington, was brought up in the Criminal Court to answer to an indictment for manslaughter. The hearing was brief and resulted in a verdict of guilty. Miss Flagler was sentenced to three hours in the district jail and a fine of $500.

Preparing for War.

Washington special: Although the subcommittee which has had the preparation of the naval appropriation bill are reticent concerning its provisions, it is believed the measure provides for six battleships and a number of torpedo boats, not exceeding fifteen. The majority of the subcommittee are known to have strongly favored this increase, notwithstanding the argument that the depleted condition of the national finances demand a smaller appropriation. The sub-committee bill is understood to provide for an increase of 1,000 in the number of enlisted men. An appropriation of $250,000 to begin the work of building reserve guns for vessels under subvention is also provided for in the subcommittee's bill.

Sad Drowning.

John A. Wolf and daughter were drowned in Youghiougheny river near Smithton, Westmoreland County, Pa. Their bodies have not yet been recovered. Wolf, in his haste to reach home, determined on fording the river instead of driving a distance around to a bridge. The stream was running full of ice, which gorged against the wheels, overturning the vehicle. The occupants were swept away. Witnesses were unable to render assistance.

Burned to Death.

Three children are dead and one lying at the Johns Hopkins Hospital in a precarious condition as the result of a fire caused by the igniting of coal oil in the house of Frederick Rose, Baltimore. The dead are:

Theresa Rose, aged 8.
Hanna Rose, aged 6.
Mary Rose, an infant of 16 months.

Willie Rose, 11 years old, is severely burned about the head, neck, hands, and limbs. There is no hope for his recovery.

A Giant Gusher.

Sistersville (W. Va.) special: Word has just been received here of the striking of the biggest oil well, not only in the history of the State, but the biggest ever found in the southwestern sands. It belongs to the Devonian Oil Company, and is located on the Weekly farm, on Indiana Creek. In the first twenty-four hours the well made over 6,000 barrels, and is now making 200 barrels an hour. With oil at $1.40, the well paid for itself in twelve hours.

Still at Large.

The robbers who attacked the Merchants' and Planters' bank at Warren, Ark., are still at large. They have been traced by a posse to near Fordice, and the chances of capture are fairly good. Rewards aggregating $2,000 have been offered for their capture. Both of the wounded men are still alive, but there are small hopes for Mr. Goodwin's recovery.

Disputed Territory.

Paris special: The Politque Colonial publishes an alleged telegram from the French consular agent at Para, Brazil, reporting that conflicts have taken place in the disputed territory, Amapa, between French Guiana and Brazil. It is added that the French troops have half destroyed Amapa, after losing 100 killed and wounded, including four officers.

Base Ball.

At the league meeting held in New York, a schedule for 1896 was adopted. The base ball season will open April 16, with Boston playing at Philadelphia, Brooklyn at Baltimore; New York at Washington; Pittsburg at Cincinnati; Cleveland at St. Louis, and Chicago at Louisville.

News of a Spanish Victory.

Madrid special: A dispatch to the Imparcial from Santiago De Cuba says that Gen. Munoz with 1,200 Spanish troops, has defeated a force of 2,000 insurgents at Salespacio and that Gen. Prats attacked Maceo's command 4,000 strong, at Logas Guamagarot.

Fatal Explosion of a Gasoline Stove.

At Eureka, S. D., a gasoline stove exploded and caused the destruction of R. S. Puckett's house and the loss of three lives. The dead are: Mrs. Frank Puckett; Battie, aged 7; Clarence, aged 4. The servant girl saved the baby. Puckett was away from home.

Charged with Treason.

Rudolph Spreckels, the youngest son of Claus Spreckles, the sugar king, is on his way to Honolulu to face the charge of treason. He is charged with furnishing money and arms to the revolutionists in their effort to overthrow the Republic.

Injured at a Fire.

The foundry of Kurtz & Buhrer, on Austin avenue, Chicago, was entirely destroyed by fire. Loss, $135,000. I. S. Cinsburg was severely burned while attempting to aid the firemen in extinguishing the blaze.

While Watching a Funeral.

Mrs. Harvey Munavy, a wealthy widow of West Lebanon, Ohio, died suddenly the other day. With several neighbors she was watching a funeral pass. She fell and expired before medical assistance arrived.

Baby's Legs Gone.

Conrad Negele's 4-year-old son, George, had both legs cut off by a train at Newark, Ohio. The child was playing by the tracks and striking the wheels with a stick when drawn under the train.

THE PEARL BRYAN MURDER

THE people of three States are still talking about the Pearl Bryan murder. Kentucky has claimed the accused on the ground that the final scene was enacted within her domain, but the crime may be said to have been committed in all three States—Indiana, Ohio and Kentucky—for it was one of many acts. It is a crime so surrounded by mystery, sorrow and horror that the smallest details have been eagerly read and discussed. Ministers have preached about it. Thousands of prayers have been sent up for those connected with it, and its awful lessons so savagely enforced are being repeated in every household and are carrying their warnings to young men and young women everywhere.

Jackson and Walling, the young medical students accused of the crime, are securely jailed at Newport, Ky., and the officers now claim to have a complete chain of evidence against them from the time Pearl Bryan went from Greencastle, Ind., Monday, Jan. 27, until Friday night, Jan. 31, when she was murdered in a secluded spot between Fort Thomas and Newport, Ky. Each of the prisoners denies guilty knowledge of the brutal deed and declares the other to be the murderer. Jackson has made a long written statement in which he recites the incidents leading up to the murder, but claims steadfastly that Walling and not he did the killing.

There is a reward of $600 by two morning papers of Cincinnati and $50 by the owner of the farm on which the murder was committed for the discovery of Pearl Bryan's head, with a prospect of $500 more from citizens of Greencastle, making $1,150. This, with the intensifying interest in the solving of the mystery, stimulates the search by everybody.

NATIONAL BUTTER MAKERS.

Stringent Laws for Filled Cheese Demanded at the Convention.

The opening session of the fourth annual meeting of the National Creamery Buttermakers and Cheesemakers' Association was held in Lincoln Club rooms at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and was well attended. After the address of welcome by Mayor Burridge and the president's address the secretary made his report, in which he said that the membership had been increased since the last meeting by over 300. The total receipts up to the present time were $1,275; expenses, $1,095, leaving a balance of $320.

Mr. Burridge recommended that a number of changes be made and that a committee be appointed at this meeting to revise the constitution.

Papers were read by several members of the association on topics of interest only to the members. The convention unanimously adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, That this association demand the passage of the Wilbur bill now before the Committee on Ways and Means, placing filled cheese under the control of internal revenue officers, and a tax and license on its manufacture and sale."

MISS FLAGLER'S SENTENCE.

A Fine of $500 and Three Hours in Jail for Killing a Little Boy.

Miss Elizabeth Flagler, daughter of Gen. Flagler, chief of ordnance, U. S. A., who last spring shot a colored boy named Green, son of a Treasury Department messenger, was arraigned in court at Washington, D. C., Tuesday. She pleaded guilty to involuntary murder and was sentenced to three hours in jail and to pay a fine of $500. Gen. Flagler paid the fine and the young lady was conducted to jail to serve the three hours.

BIG BRIDGE COLLAPSES.

Structure Connecting Rock Island and Davenport Goes Down.

With a crash that could be heard for blocks, a 180-foot section of the Government bridge between Rock Island, Ill., and Davenport, Iowa, dropped into the Mississippi river Tuesday, carrying with it the derricks and other appliances that were used in the reconstruction work that was in progress, and involving in the wreck the cables of the Western Union and Postal Telegraph Companies, the Central Union Telephone Company, People's Light Company, and Tri-City Railway Company. The Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific found its system cut in two by the gap and made arrangements to send its southwestern and western business for the east over the Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern tracks to Clinton, via Columbus Junction and West Liberty. Another result of the accident was the shutting down of the street car system of Davenport.

One workman was injured, Bert Kustard, a Swede, having both legs broken. A train of cars loaded with sand occupied the bridge at the time for the purpose of adding to its stability by its weight, but was to have been removed in a few minutes to permit the firefly passenger to cross. The latter train stood upon the sound portion of the bridge when the drawspan went down, and hastily backed to a safer location in time to save passengers from anything worse than a bad fright.

The Phoenix Bridge Company was rebuilding the bridge and widening its upper deck so as to allow the Rock Island road a double track, the Government and the road sharing the expense. Residents who know the terrible impact of the ice at the spring break-up have shaken their heads and speculated upon what would happen when the ice came down against the false work that upheld the drawspan. Work on this span was being hurried so that it could be swung for the first boat after navigation opened, but the predictions of the wiseacres came true. A five-foot rise was followed by a movement of the ice that snapped the heavy timbers upholding the span like so many toothpicks and utterly wrecked the draw. The ice field, having done its work, moved down the river. The Phoenix Company estimates its loss at $50,000.

TARIFF BILL DEAD.

Morrill's Unsuccessful Effort to Have the Measure Taken Up.

After some routine business in the Senate Tuesday Mr. Morrill, chairman of the Finance Committee, presented a resolution to take up the tariff bill. Mr. Morrill began with a brief statement as to the complications on the tariff bill. He said it had been apparent for many months that there was a deficiency in the revenues. During every month since the present tariff bill went into effect there had been a deficiency.

"How was it before?" interjected Mr. Cockrell.

Mr. Morrill went on to state that the deficiency up to this time had reached $20,000,000. If we went on at the same rate the deficiency would be $30,000,000 for the year. It was certainly manifest that Congress should do something to relieve the treasury and assist in the revival of business. Therefore, concluded the Senator, he moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the tariff bill.

The roll call proceeded with many interruptions in order to allow Senators to pair. The announcement that Mr. Morrill's motion had been defeated—yeas, 22; nays, 33—was not unexpected in view of the vote some days ago. The detailed vote was as follows:

Yeas—Republicans, Aldrich, Allison, Baker, Brown, Burrows, Cameron, Clark, Cullom, Davis, Gear, Hale, Hansbrough, Hawley, Lodge, Mitchell (Or.), Morrill, Nelson, Perkins, Proctor, Quay, Sherman, Shoup—22.

Nays—Republicans, Cannon, Carter, Dubois, Mantle and Teller (5); Democrats, Bacon, Bate, Berry, Caffery, Call, Chilton, Cockrell, George, Gordon, Gray, Harris, Hill, Lindsay, Martin, Morgan, Palmer, Pasco, Roach, Turpie, Vest, Walthall, White (22); Populists, Allen, Butler, Jones (Nev.), Kyle, Peffer and Stewart (6)—total, 33.

The announcement of the vote was the signal for a remarkable colloquy between Mr. Morrill and Mr. Teller.

As soon as the vote was announced Mr. Morrill again addressed the Senate. It was now evident, he said, that the Republican party was in the minority in the Senate.

A chorus of derisive laughter came from the Democratic side of the chamber at this statement.

Mr. Morrill, not noticing the interruption, proceeded to state that in his judgment the tariff bill was defeated by a vote including five silver Republicans and six Populists. There was no substantial change in the present and former votes. It settled all questions of doubt. The Senator said the Republican members of the Finance Committee would be ready at any time before Congress adjourned to come to the relief of the treasury. "But as to the bill," concluded Mr. Morrill, "I do not think it would become me to ask any further time."

Mr. Teller secured recognition as soon as Mr. Morrill concluded. The Colorado Senator spoke with intense earnestness and feeling and at times a vein of sarcasm and bitterness was evident. He referred scornfully to the assertion of Mr. Morrill that there was not a Republican majority in the Senate. That was a fact that had long been understood. This statement, said Mr. Teller, came with a motion out of time and out of place to proceed with the tariff bill. The Senator from Vermont, Mr. Morrill, declared that certain Senators on the Republican side of the chamber are no longer members of the Republican party. The Senator from Montana (Carter), who was in the judgment of Mr. Teller as good a Republican as the Senator from Vermont (Morrill), had moved to recommit the bill.

"I charge," proceeded Mr. Teller, "and I will seek to prove later, that this tariff bill was never presented with any purpose of passing it."

"If the Senator from Vermont," continued Mr. Teller, "thinks he can embarrass those who have been as devoted to the Republican party as he has been, then he is mistaken. I will follow my own judgment on this question. And I will stay in the Republican party in spite of the Senator from Vermont. This shallow effort to pass a tariff bill, added Mr. Teller, was degrading to the American Senate. It was degrading to those who took part in it.

Mr. Morrill interrupted to say: "I have read no man out of the Republican party."

Mr. Teller responded that the whole spirit of Mr. Morrill's course in this line of driving out of the party all those who did not agree with with himself, was the same intolerance shown by the metropolitan press, which had already read the silver Republicans out of the party.

Mr. Sherman followed with a severe arraignment of the inaction of Congress, saying it was a crime against the country and against civilization. He declared that he would continue to urge action on the tariff bill.

Mr. Frye (Rep. Me.) took the floor to declare that the tariff bill was dead as Julius Caesar. Business interests demanded that the statement be made emphatically that the bill was dead. He hoped it would never be heard from again and that the responsibility should rest where it belonged.

CHAPTER XL.

Colonel Grey's suit had hitherto certainly not met with the success it deserved. Even he, stolid and impregnable to rebuffs as he had seemed, was beginning to fear that his perseverance was misapplied.

"Colonel Grey has been here. He has done you the honor of asking your hand, Diana," Mr. Knollys said to his daughter, earnestly, one day.

"An honor which I respectfully beg to decline, though of course alive to the tremendous advantages of such a marriage," she returned, with a sweeping courtesy.

"Don't talk nonsense, Di. Whom do you intend to marry?"

"Why, really papa——" she began; but he stopped her sharply and went on:

"You are twenty-five——"

"Twenty-six and a bit," she admitted, candidly, interrupting him in her turn.

"The more reason you should be thinking of settling down. I can tell you that in this country men begin to fight shy of a girl who at your age is stingle still."

Diana was speechless with haughtiest surprise. Was her father going to be the first to turn renegade from the creed that he had taught her?

"You would rather I made a mesalliance than not marry at all?" she questioned, blankly.

"Tut, tut! There is no question of a mesalliance in this case. I should never be ashamed of Colonel Grey if he were my son-in-law."

"Would you be proud?" she asked, looking searchingly into his face. "And should I be proud of acknowledging a parish doctor as my father-in-law? Papa, you can't be contemplating such a match in earnest!"

"His sister is Lady St. Maur. His cousin is the celebrated Q. C., and he has interest at the Horse Guards."

"If he were very rich I could understand it," went on Diana, thoughtfully.

"He is not so good a match in point of money as Mr. Graeme, of course; but still——"

His daughter confronted him pale and trembling.

"Do you mean, papa, that you could ever forget his connection with trade, that you would allow me to marry Mr. Graeme even—even if I wished it, and—and he wished it, too?"

"My dear, I should be only too pleased," replied the Commissioner, fumbling among his papers, as though politely to imply that just then he could better bear her absence than her presence. But so long a silence ensued that he fixed his glasses on his nose, and looked through them at his daughter.

She was blushing like a rose, at the thoughts that were passing through her mind; but Mr. Knollys fancied it was wounded pride that had sent the color to her cheek, and hastened to make his meaning clear.

"I don't deny, Diana, that I was very ambitious for you at first. At twenty—when I went home on furlough, before your poor mother died, you remember! you were the loveliest girl I had ever seen—no position seemed to me then higher than you had a right to fill—the divine right of beauty, my dear. You are handsome still, but not as you were six years ago. You are older now, of course; and somehow you have never been a great favorite with men. Forgive my plain speaking, Di."

"I dare say you are only cruel to be kind," she answered, quickly, too proud to let him see how hurt she was. "I won't keep you from your work, papa."

She did not put into words the thought that crept into her mind with insidious sweetness, yet with a little sadness, that if her father had ceased to expect great things for her, she need not certainly immolate herself on the shrine of ambition. Ever since she had first discovered what she then considered her mad love for the son of the Scotch brewer, she had striven hard to stamp it out, or at least to live it down. She had never allowed herself to dwell on the happiness such a love might have been, if he returned it. Scarcely had she asked herself whether he could ever care for her or not; she had always striven to throw him and Jane Knox together whenever it was possible. But now—now?

She went to Mrs. Dene's that same morning, and found Val Graeme there as he generally was. Jane was there, too, looking pale and tired, but she went to meet Diana with a welcoming smile.

"It is three whole days since you have been here," she said, reproachfully. "Come round the garden for a chat."

She nodded somewhat cavalierly to the young fellow, who was on his knees mending her tennis bat, as she left the room.

"Mrs. Dene will be here in a few minutes," she called out cheerfully over her shoulder.

Diana, who scarcely looked up when Mr. Graeme greeted her, only including him in a genial "how do," felt angry with Jane, then inconsequently pleased. Perhaps it was only so, by her indifference, that he might look elsewhere for appreciation.

It was a humiliating admission, nevertheless, she was obliged to confess to herself, that she would have no chance against the Quartermaster's daughter were any rivalry to be between them. It was strange what a fascination that girl had for such widely different natures, and she pleased without effort, even against her will. She had thwarted Diana's attempt to make a mercenary marriage with the two eligibles in the station, the Hon. Barry Larron and Stephen Prinsep—was she to spoil her love, too? It was with a jealous inflection in her tones that she said presently:

"I am afraid I interrupted your tete-a-tete."

"A tete-a-tete that bade fair to last all day"—with a rebellious pout. "He came to breakfast, and then Mrs. Dene was very busy, so left me to entertain him. I was very glad indeed you came."

"Is that true?"

"Yes, of course. Why, you don't think——" Jane stopped short, meeting the other's searching glance. She knew she was being cross-questioned, but for one moment did not quite see for what object.

"Jane," asked Diana, solemnly, "do you mean to marry Mr. Graeme?"

"I? No. What an idea!"—with the ghost of a smile.

"Then"—desperately—"why don't you show him so plainly and—and let others see."

"Diana," said Jane, demurely, as they were still beyond ear-shot, "I don't think I shall have much to explain after all. There was certainly nothing of flirtation, nothing even personal in our long conversation to-day. It had just struck me that Mr. Graeme was talking nearly all the time about you."

There was no pallor nor pride in Miss Knollys' face now, she was blushing like any school-girl as they reached Mrs. Dene's side, and she could scarcely stammer out a suitable remark. An odd mixture of shame and triumph made her quite unlike herself. She was afraid to meet Jane's eyes lest she should guess what keen hope her words had awakened. Directly she could she took her leave, only too glad to be alone to think.

And now Jane had something to consider. Her thoughts lately had been concentrated on her own affairs, and she was weary of trying to solve the vexed problem of how best to unravel the tangled skein of difficulties that beset her. It was a relief to turn her attention to something else, if only for a short time. She knew Valentine Graeme had admired—been near loving her, in fact, before her engagement to Colonel Prinsep was announced, and that again of late his interest in her had seemed to be reviving; but she had known too much of really passionate love, the love associated, alas, with sin and sorrow, to believe that his affection was very deeply seated.

An opportunity to talk with Valentine alone occurred later in the day. He had stayed to luncheon, and afterward all three were gathered round the fire, he chatting to Mrs. Dene, and Jane deep in thought as to how she could best bring about an explanation. Then some household duty called Mrs. Dene away, and the two were left alone.

"How nice this idle time is!" observed Valentine, deamily; then, with one of his flashes of fun, he added, comically, "Don't spoil it by trying to amuse me."

She laughed. It was an old joke against her that she took the verb "to entertain" too literally. It must have been in some measure due to her Scotch blood, or that unconsciously some memory of the old, more practical life in barracks remained with her; at any rate she never allowed the mind of any visitor to stay long unoccupied, and when Valentine spent the day with them as now, there was no chance of his finding any leisure time to misapply.

Mrs. Dene had noticed first how Jane provided all her guests with albums and books of views, then sat near primly explaining or descanting on their merits. Since then it had become a universal joke.

Now, however, she wanted only to talk, and said so.

"I am afraid," said Val, thoughtfully, "I have exhausted my originality. I don't believe I have another remark to make. You could hardly expect it after a whole day's uninterrupted conversation."

"That's just it. Why do you come so often?" blurted out Jane.

He pushed his chair back from the fire, and sprung to his feet.

"Do you mean that I am unwelcome—that I come too often?" he exclaimed, blankly.

"Suppose," she said, with a faint smile hovering on her lips, "that all this time, while you have been fancying so differently, you have been in reality steadily but unconsciously falling in love with some one ever so much prettier and nicer than I"—an obstinate shake of the head from Val, which she ignored. "Suppose too, that she is beginning to care for you in return. And suppose you should be fortunate enough to win such a beautiful bride, and there should be a wedding—and I should be there, so glad, oh, so glad to see two such good friends happy!"

Valentine flushed like a girl, and his heart was beating quickly. Was it possible that what she said was true—that he really did love Diana best? he thought to himself.

"And you, Jenny?—how is it to be with you?" asked Valentine.

"With me? Oh, never mind me!" she replied, with her face still turned away.

"But I do mind you very much. Tell me," he said, deliberately—for he had weighed the matter in his mind, and concluded that he was not so deeply in love with Diana, but that he had a very reasonable chance of happiness with Jane if she decided to accept him; he had the first claim upon his affections, and it would not be such a terrible sacrifice after all—"tell me, would you not be happier if you married me? You know me better than nearly any one else and I would take good care of you, be sure. Don't you think you could be content with me?"

She turned quickly and placed her hands in his. She understood him at once, and saw more clearly than he saw himself that he was offering to give up his own happiness for hers.

"How good you are—how good you are!" she murmured. "Indeed, I am very grateful; but what you suggest could never be. Never, believe me," she repeated firmly, as he made a movement to speak.

Both remained silent for a moment, then she spoke again.

"I must go and find Mrs. Dene now. Thank you so much for everything you have said; and good-by."

As Valentine wended his way home to the mess, he too had something to consider.

CHAPTER XLI.

It could not naturally remain long a secret to Mrs. Dene that something had happened to keep Valentine from the house; and when she questioned Jane, the answer was given frankly enough.

"Mr. Graeme was halting between two opinions, whether he liked Diana or me the better, so I helped him to decide. He actually did not know that he was in love with Diana till I told him."

"And so lost him for yourself," said Mrs. Dene, with a suspicious remonstrance in her tone.

Jane lifted her eyebrows slightly.

"I did not want him. I never intend to marry at all."

Mrs. Dene was silent. It occurred to her that it might really end so. First the Colonel, and then the Sergeant, the lover of former days, had been dismissed, and afterward the little A. D. C. and Barry Larron. Now the Adjutant was sent away. She was losing all her lovers.

But after a few days she found occasion to alter her opinion. Colonel Prinsep had been three times to the bungalow on three successive mornings. True, he had stayed only a short time on each occasion, and he always came with a declared object; yet some subtle change in his manner betrayed that he no longer even wished to believe himself indifferent to Jane. And Jane, what were her feelings on the subject? She determined to find out.

"Jenny," she said that same evening, as they sat together after their quiet dinner, "I wonder why Colonel Prinsep has been here so often lately?"

Jenny's head was bent low over her work as she answered:

"You and he were always good friends."

"And are still. But if his coming were disagreeable to you—is it disagreeable to you, Jenny?"

She raised her eyes. Mrs. Dene sat opposite to her, her knitting needles flashing in and out of her fleecy work, the firelight glancing upon her short curls and down-turned face. It struck Jane how young and winning she looked. A sharp fear assailed her that in this might be the secret of Stephen Prinsep's visits lately. Her husband had been dead a year now.

Jane, like many others, had never thought there had been any deep affection between Captain Dene and his wife; therefore it was the more likely she would marry again, and what so probable as that the old friendship that had always been between her and the Colonel should develop into something sweeter?

"Is it?" repeated Nora Dene, softly.

"No; why should it be?" was the reply given in clear, metallic tones. "We have both forgotten everything—everything that might make it uncomfortable for us to meet."

A slight incredulous glance, but nothing more. They should have their own way, Mrs. Dene decided, and come together if so inclined, without any interference from her.

The following morning Colonel Prinsep went to the bungalo again. Jane was outside, but fled in-doors when she saw him in the distance. As he passed where she had been, he glanced to see what she had been doing. A large flower-pot of cuttings was standing there with several smaller ones ranged beside it, and on the ground lay a large silver ring that she had taken off before she had begun her work, and in her rapid flight had forgotten. It was the ring she always wore on the third finger of her left hand, and which Colonel Prinsep had once thought might be a sign of her betrothal to Jacob Lynn. Now he lifted and examined it curiously. It was evidently of Indian workmanship, quaintly embossed, and so made that it seemed like three rings joined. As he fingered it, the center section moved beneath his touch. It turned completely, and he saw that below lay perdu a wedding-ring. It could only be the one that he had thrown down in anger the day they were to have been married.

Under his fair mustache his lips quivered in half-amused emotion, his eyes grew wondrously soft in their expression; he felt tempted to forego his waiting game, and following Jane, confront her with this proof of her love for him. Yet he knew he should only be courting another refusal. He waited a moment to harden himself a little to the part he had to play, and then slipping back the tiny, shifting panel, took out the plain gold hoop, and let the outside case still open, drop upon the ground. It rolled close to a small stream that ran through the compound, so near that the inner ring might well be supposed to have fallen into the water instead of reposing safely as it did in Colonel Prinsep's waistcoat-pocket. Then he went through the open door into the drawing-room, where he found Mrs. Dene alone. He had come ostensibly to tell the ladies of some regimental sports, which were to take place that afternoon, and ask permission to escort them there.

Mrs. Dene readily consented, "if," she supplemented, "Jane would go."

"Then I had better wait till she comes," observed Colonel Prinsep.

IN THE CAPITOL'S CRYPT.

A Bride Is Lost There and Made Crazy Through Fear.

"For several years I was an official guide at the capitol in Washington," said a gentleman recently, "and during that time I saw some queer things about the building. But I was always most interested in the wandering ghost in the crypt. Report has it that a soldier was left in the crypt one night and was never heard of afterward, but his spirit is supposed to be cavorting around there yet looking for a way out. The ghost story has crept into print many times, but that crypt did come very nearly causing a tragedy once. Late one afternoon, a young lady, married to a new Congressman but a short time, on her first visit to Washington was shown through the crypt with some friends. Somehow the bride became separated from her friends and couldn't find her way out. The Congressman looked for her everywhere, and everybody joined in the search. No trace of her could be found, so they went home, thinking she might have gone out ahead of them. But she was not there, either. Another search was made next morning, and at last they found her, way down in one of the darkest passages of the crypt, where she had been all night with the rats and bugs. They picked her up, but when she got home she was a raving maniac. The terrors of the night had been too much for her. The Congressman took her to their Illinois home, and I never heard of her afterward until a recent visit to Jacksonville, Ill. The superintendent of the State Insane Asylum is a personal friend of mine, and I called on him. He conducted me through the institution, and while I was passing through one of the 'violent' wards for women. I heard a shriek come from a woman. It startled me, and when I turned, my eyes fell upon a wild-looking creature, whose hair was snow white, but who was apparently yet a young woman. Her figure and features, although the latter had lost their intelligence, bore evidence of great beauty once. 'Who is that woman?' I asked. 'She is the wife of Congressman F——,' he replied. I asked him no more about her, because I knew only too well the story of her misfortune, and was only too glad to dismiss the horrible details of her mental dethronement and confinement from my mind."

Love and Labor.

Love lives to labor; it lives to give itself away. There is no such thing as indolent love. Look in your heart and see if this is not true. If you love any one truly and deeply, the cry of your heart is to spend and be spent in the loved one's service.

Love would die if it could not benefit. Its keenest suffering is met when it finds itself unable to assist.

What man could see the woman he loves lack anything, and be unable to give it to her, and not suffer?

"Why love makes one a slave! It toils night and day, refusing all wages and all reward save the smile of the one unto whom it is bound, in whose service it finds its delight, at whose feet it alone discovers its heaven.

There is no danger that language can be too strong or too fervently used to portray the services of love.

By cradle and couch, by sick bed and coffin, in hut and palace, the ministries of love are being wrought. The eyes of all behold them; the hearts of all are moved by the spectacle.

COL. BOB'S CHURCH.

ONE WHICH THE GREAT INFIDEL WOULD JOIN.

Teachings of Rev. Bartlett at Kalamazoo, Mich.—Congregation Comprises Jews, Gentiles, Protestants, Catholics, and All Creeds.

Popular with the People.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll has at last found a church which he likes. It is in fact, a most remarkable church, the only one of its kind in the United States. It is the People's Church, of Kalamazoo, Mich., and its pastor is Rev. Caroline J. Bartlett, whom Col. Ingersoll characterizes as a remarkable person. Before the lecture he met Miss Bartlett and she showed him through the People's Church and explained its features to him. Its doors are open to every one—Jew, infidel, agnostic, atheist, or Christian—who desires to see the world grow better and a fitter place to live in. "I believe in God and immortality and prayer," said Miss Bartlett, "but I grant perfect freedom to every member of the church to believe what it believable to him." "If all churches were like this, free and always open, and working to make people better every day," responded the great infidel, heartily, "I would never say one word against churches or religion. If I lived here I would join this church if it would receive me." Thereupon Miss Bartlett extended the right hand of fellowship to him and invited him to join.

The People's Church is unique. Entirely without creed, its members bind themselves simply to make themselves, their neighbors and the world better. The church edifice, with its furnishings, cost $50,000. There is no debt. Its 700 seats are all free and there are no collections. Voluntary contributions prove ample for its support.

The building is open every day in the year and the work goes on daily. There is a gymnasium for women and children with a paid instructor and seventy-two pupils from the factory districts, and on Sunday mornings a creche is maintained while the mothers worship. Of course, there are the usual parlors and a kitchen. The Frederick Douglass Club, which meets each week, is the result of an invitation to the young colored people of the city to use the parlors. In all, there are twenty-seven meeting each week in the church and a school of domestic economy for the young and a singing school for working girls are among the features planned.

Miss Bartlett's first training was on a daily newspaper. Then she became the pastor of the Unitarian Church at Kalamazoo. This denomination was twenty-eight years old in Kalamazoo, and was at a standstill, if not worse. She induced the organization to take up daily work on educational and humanitarian lines, and it immediately prospered. Then she began to talk of a new church edifice. Silas Hubbard gave $20,000, which he said he had saved in twenty years by abstaining from tobacco and liquor and investing the nickels saved. The new church was begun.

A short time before the dedication of the church Miss Bartlett proposed that the church become absolutely unsectarian in name, as she had tried to make it in fact. The name "Unitarian," it was thought, suggested a creed, and so it was finally voted to adopt the name, "People's Church." The bond of union, however, the only thing to which those who join the church are asked to subscribe, remained the same as before. This is its reading:

"Earnestly desiring to develop in ourselves, and in the world, honest, reverent thought, faithfulness to our highest conceptions of right living, the spirit of love and service to our fellow men, and allegiance to all the interests of morality and religion as interpreted by the growing thought and purest lives of humanity, we join ourselves together, hoping to help one another in all good things, and to advance the cause of pure and practical religion in the community; basing our union upon no creedal test, but upon the purpose herein expressed, and welcoming all who wish to join us to help establish truth, righteousness and love in the world."

Even the unterrified Colonel "Bob" has decided he can subscribe to that.

Miss Bartlett is radical and fearless in her utterances, but she believes there is good in every religious faith, and "comparative religion" is one of the studies of the Sunday school, though it is not carried on under that name. The creeds of the different sects and denominations and the work of the various benevolent societies of the city are systematically studied.

PARIS IN WINTER.

Not Very Comfortable for Warm-Blooded Americans.

"Coal in Paris is bric-a-brac," laughed a woman who is just home from a year's residence in the French capital, "and a stove, oh, a stove is a large article of vertu. When we began to freeze last winter, which we did at the first cold weather, over tiny grates set in a corner of the room where they will throw out the least heat, even when at their best, I announced that we must have a stove. There were three women of us doing Paris in lodgings, and the others agreed, commissioning me to act as purchaser. 'You will see a stove here to-night,' I said, confidentially, as we separated one morning. But they didn't. I traveled up and down before I fell in with my American ideas of a stove, and when finally I did find an approach to my standard, I found its price, too. That was larger than the stove. Sixty dollars! Of course, we couldn't pay that for a couple of months' use of a stove. I asked the dealer if he would rent it. After a parley he consented, but wanted $5 a month. I reported the proceedings to my friends, and we decided to rent the stove. The Frenchman assured me the stove consumed ten cents' worth of coal a day. Perhaps it did, with the fire kept at his conception of what a fire is for, but we piled that stove to its limit, and it ate up a dollar's worth of coal at French rates every twenty-four hours. Those who treasure notions that Paris is a cheap place of residence for Americans should keep out of it in winter. They will find themselves bankrupt before spring, and there will not have been one cold day that their apartments will be filled with a genial warmth such as pervades all our American rooms outside the most squalid homes."—New York Times.

CECIL JOHN RHODES.

Man Whose Master Hand Was Behind the Transvaal Trouble.

Behind the trouble in the Transvaal and behind the Jameson expedition, whose sole purpose is now admitted to have been the absorption of the South African republic and its gold fields by the British, is the master hand of Cecil John Rhodes, Premier of Cape Colony, richest man in South Africa, and, in reality, lord of the dark continent.

Managing director of the Imperial South Africa Company, his uncompromising ambition has ever been to extend the power and the possessions of the company northward to the Zambesi and to establish the grandest and richest of British possessions abroad. Born of a poor English clergyman and immigrating to South Africa at 16 for the sake of his health, Cecil Rhodes has grown to be the uncrowned king of the country, and has, by shrewdness, foresight and matchless executive ability, built up a fortune of $75,000,000 or more.

By consolidating all the diamond companies in the mining districts he advanced the price of precious stones in the world's marts, and through his indefatigable effort and comprehensive management Great Britain has slowly but surely marched northward in Africa, until now she is in a fair way of thrusting her great, conquering foot on the little Dutch republic of the Transvaal. Rhodes' power began in 1869, when at 16 years of age he claimed the fields of Kimberly with both hands, afterward to cement the diamond wealth of the country by consolidating all the companies, controlling the output. While working his mines he pursued his studies and one day went to England, passed the examination at Oxford, and returned to Africa an A. B. Since then his rise has been rapid, and he has left no scheme untried that was calculated to advance the interests of the company of which he is the practical master.

Clean Stables.

Start into the winter with clean stables, and keep them in that condition. We always hear that stock of all kinds are more liable to contract disease in winter than summer, and no doubt many ills that stock contract in winter may be traced to filthy stables and bad ventilation. Clean stalls and good bedding make stock healthy.

Political Announcements

EDITOR COURIER:—

You will please announce my name as a candidate for Congress from the 12th Congressional District, subject to the Democratic nominating convention to be held at Kendallville, April 7th 1896.

JAMES M. ROBINSON.

Fort Wayne, Ind.

CONGRESSIONAL CONVENTION.

At a meeting composed of the chairmen of the Democratic Central Committees of the several counties of the Twelfth Congressional District and the district committeemen, held at Fort Wayne on the 8th day of January, 1896, it was determined that the convention for the nomination of a democratic candidate for Congress, to represent the district, would be held at the Opera House in the city of Kendallville on at 2 o'clock p. m. All delegates heretofore elected, or such as may be hereafter elected to said convention are requested to take notice and be present at the convention at the time and place above stated, without further notification. Democrats generally are invited to be present. The representation for the several counties is as follows, and is based upon one delegate for each one hundred and fractions of fifty votes and over cast for Claude Matthews for Governor in 1896.

LUCK?

and success are two different things. There are many who have luck thrust upon them, yet are not shrewd enough to grasp the opportunity and turn it to success. Many have termed the managers of the who now own the big store located on South Main street, as being a set of lucky people. If, taking into consideration their business foresight, sagacity and persistency, we may also agree with them to what they term lucky. It is a well known fact that they know a good thing when the see it, and don't let a good thing slip by. They have lately rented the big store, two doors north of the Fruit House and now have in stock a fine line of Candies, Fruits, Canned Goods, Cigars, Tobaccos, and in fact carry, in both stores, anything a person can wish for. Now, if you have never patronized the new Confectionery Store, do so at once. The fresh stock of Candies is the finest to be found in the city.

County Meeting

The Full Account of the New Democratic Organization on Saturday.

The democratic committeemen from the several precincts of the county met at Waterloo, Saturday, Feb. 29, at 1:30 p. m. pursuant to call by the county chairman John F. Shuman. They met in Armory Hall, and were called to order by Mr. Shuman, who stated the object of the meeting, and secretary, Phil Plum read the call. The chairman said the first in order would be the selection of a temporary chairman. A. J. Baxter, of Butler was chosen, and the democratic editors, Gardner and Barns were made secretaries. The election of a new county chairman was declared in order, and the names of Wm. McMorgan, of Butler, and W. J. Frederick, of Garrett, were announced. It was decided to vote by ballot. A motion was made by John Picker to have tellers, which was carried, but after some discussion, this was changed so that each township announce its own vote.

THE VOTE.

TOWNSHIPS	FREDERICK	MCMORGAN
Butler	1
Concord	1
Fairfield	2
Franklin		2
Grant	1½	1½
Jackson	1	1
Keyser	6
Newville	1
Richland	2
Smithfield	2
Union	4
Wilmington		6
Totals	21½	10½

And the chair declared Mr. Frederick elected.

It will be seen that the total vote was only 32, which is accounted for by Stafford and Troy not being represented and Concord had only one present when she has three committeemen.

For vice-chairman, L. J. Miller, F. A. Borst and John Robbins were announced. But Mr. Robbins declined and Mr. Borst who was not present, was withdrawn, and Miller was elected by acclamation.

The nomination of a treasurer was next in order. C. P. Hamman named F. A. Borst; B. B. McEnterfer named H. K. Lese; Frank Dills named J. Wm. Wagner. But Mr. Wagner declined and Mr. Borst was withdrawn, and then Mr. Lese was elected by acclamation on motion of Mr. Gengler.

The selection of a secretary was left to the chairman as is customary.

Mr. Frederick was called and made a short speech, full of good advice and cheer, and then came up the matter of selecting delegates to the congressional convention to be held at Kendallville April 7. It was finally decided that caucuses should be called for this purpose in each township, April 28, the hour and place of meeting to be fixed by the several committeemen. After another brief speech by Mr. Frederick the meeting adjourned subject to the call of the chairman.

The attendance was quite large in spite of the bad roads, and the best of feeling prevailed throughout.

Joint Senators

As the question in regard to the apportionment still hangs fire, there is no other course for parties to take, but to go on and nominate under the apportionment of 1885. This leaves DeKalb and Noble in one senatorial district, as heretofore, and at present J. E. McDonald of Ligonier is joint senator, having been elected in 1892. For the previous four years, Hon. A. M. Jackson, also of Ligonier, was our senator. The office, therefore, should have come to DeKalb county in 1892, but as our county had two candidates in the convention, Freeman Kelly and W. H. Lese, we could not agree or unite, and after several ballots, Mr. McDonald got it. This time of course, it should come to DeKalb county and both democrats and republicans ought to agree on this, that each party should put up a DeKalb man. In this way, DeKalb would be sure to have a representative in the state senate, and for the first time since 1888, Nicholas Easley having been elected in 1884. As to the chances, it seems to be about even as to which party will get it.

A Remarkable Cure.

Mrs. H. B. Adams, 1609 Wabash ave., Chacago, says: "I had a scrofulous taint of the blood from childhood, which however, remained dormant. An ulcer began on the side of the nose, having all the appearance of a most malignant cancer. The agony of mind I suffered cannot be described as I contemplated the progress of such a malignant disease. Finally I was induced to try Foley's Sarsaparilla. It appeared to neutralize the poison in the blood. The growth of the ulcer ceased. The diseased tissues in the bottom and edges of the sore seemed to loosen and the natural flesh to take its place. No part of the disease remains." Robbins & McCord. 10-13

The most Popular.

A canvass among the druggists of this place reveals the fact that Chamberlain's are the most popular proprietary medicines sold. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, especially, is regraded as in the lead of all throat trouble remedies, and as such, is freely prescribe by physicians. As a croup medicine, it is also unexcelled, and most families with young children keep a bottle always handy for instant use. The editor of the Graphic has repeatedly known Chamberlain's Cough Remedy to do the work after all other medicines had failed.—The Kimball S. D. Graphic. For sale at 25 and 50 cents per bottle by F. E. Davenport.

The Gravel Road

The DAILY gave notes on this case last week, and a brief statement of the matter. The witnesses named were all examined and then after argument by the counsel, it was left with the two Commissioners, Mr. Hague and Mr. Bateman As noted last week, Mr. Henderson did not sit on the case, as some of his land would be assessed. The other two members of the board took time to think of it over Sunday, and yesterday rendered their decision. It was in favor of the petitioners and against the remonstrants That is, the decision is that the petition as prayed for will stand and the road be made in accordance, As we said last week, the heaviest expense will fall on the land lying on the road, and this may be quite heavy. But on the lands farther away, the cost will be light. And if good gravel can be secured for use, and the roadbed properly fitted up and improved, it will be a great benefit. As it is the first public gravel road in the county, its importance cannot be overestimated for if it is a success, as no doubt it will be, it will be an inducement to other localities to gravel their roads, or if not to gravel them, the people will learn better methods of construction Concord is taking the lead, and being one of the best off, financially, is the best able to make the experiment. Let us hope it will be a success, and that in course of years our roads will not be the mud ways of the present day.

Democratic Caucuses

The democratic voters are called to meet in the several townships, at the usual place of holding township caucuses on

Saturday March 28, 1896,

At 2 p. m. except in cases where the committeemen select a different hour. This meeting is to select 27 delegates to the congressional and senatorial conventions, which will be held at Kendallville, April 7, 1896 at 2 p. m. The basis for selecting delegates is, one delegate for each 100 votes cast for Gov. Matthews in 1892, and one delegate for 50 or more votes in excess of the 100. Townships having less than 50 votes will be entitled to one delegate who shall have only one half a vote.

The following table shows the vote of each township in 1892, and the number of delegates each will be entitled to in the congressional and joint senator conventions. Delegates for state, county, etc., will be chosen at a future meeting.

TOWNSHIPS	VOTES	CONG.	SEN.
Concord	200	2	2
Fairfield	217	2	2
Franklin	98	1	1
Grant	207	2	2
Jackson	116	1	1
Keyser	577	6	6
Newville	49	½	½
Richland	139	1	1
Smithfield	137	1	1
Stafford	47	½	½
Troy	40	½	½
Union	464	4½	4½
Wilmington	372	4	4
Total	2749	27	27

It will be seen that under the rule Union township would have 5 delegates, but as the number is limited to 27, the odd votes of Union, were omitted, as the number was less than the odd number in either Keyser or Wilmington.

It is requested that the committeemen in the several townships will look to this matter and secure a good attendance at whatever hour they may select for the meeting. Names and postoffice addresses of delegates as well as of committeemen should be sent to the county chairman, so that he may have a full list.

WM. J. FREDERICK,
Chairman County Committee.

Obituary of Mrs. James Provines.

Helen Provines, daughter of Joseph and Maria Woolsey, was born in Delaware, N. Y., on Nov. 10th, 1844, and died Feb. 24th, 1896, aged 57 years, 3 months and 14 days.

In the year 1847 she, with her parents, came to the state of Indiana, then a wilderness, and settled on the farm which was her last earthly home, and here surrounded by the busy cares of life she strived to make a home for her husband and children which should be all that the word "home" means. She was one of a family of ten children, two brothers and seven sisters. One brother and four sisters having preceded her to their furture home.

On Nov. 11, 1869, she was united in marriage to James Provines. To this union three children were born, Frank A., Mary E and Perry M., who, with her husband and two grand-children are left to mourn and miss the loss of wife and mother. At 35 years of age she experienced religion and chose the M. E. church for her religious home, of which she remained a consistent member until her death. For many years she was almost a constant sufferer which she bore with Christian resignation. She would not allow herself to become a care to her loved ones as long as she could care for herself. She tried to live a Christian life and died a Christian death and has gone to receive her reward. She will be missed by her relatives and friends to whom she was always ready to lend a helping hand whenever or wherever her services were needed. She selected the text for her funeral sermon from 2d. Timothy, 4th, 7th and 8th verses.

The funeral services were held at her home, conducted by her pastor, Rev. F. L. Erlougher. A large concourse of friends followed her remains to their last resting place in Woodlawn cemetery at Auburn.

CORUNNA.

Dr. Mercer was in Auburn last Thursday.

Rev. Edger preached an elogunent sermon last Sunday at the M. E. church.

Gus Fraas and wife are visiting Mrs. F's parents in LaGrange county.

Geo. Weimer was on the sick list last week.

David Shaffer is going into the poultry business. He has sent off for some blooded fowls.

Wm. A. Banker has purchased the Levi Hartman property north of Milo Thomas' Hardware store, and we understand will build a business room thereon in the near future.

R. H. Sherlock and Marion Franks attended the Democratic Convention in Waterloo last Saturday.

We imagined that we felt the charming presence of Miss Spring near us last Thursday, Guess she was coquetting with old winter and being so very young and shy she made her stay extremely short.

H. D. Chamberlain, V. S. of Waterloo was on our streets, last Friday.

Dr. Bowen is engaging in the rupture cure business. Those suffering from ruptures can be treated at home instead of having to go elsewhere for such cures.

Thomas Parker of the Kendallville News was calling on friends here on last Saturday.

Ira W, Bowen of Thompsonville, Mich. visited with his son, Dr. M. Bowen of this place, Thursday and Friday of last week. During the war he was Postmaster and a prominent merchant in the old frame building which then stood on the ground now occupied by the Thomas hardware store. Mr. Bowen has since been engaged in the lumber and shingle business, and is now on his way to Arkansas to take charge of a lumbering plant owned by a Chicago Syndicate.

Don't send your orders away for printed envelopes, when you can get them in Corunna as cheap as anywhere on the American continent, (or any other conti- for that matter.) Leave your orders at the Postoffice, and see what nice work we will do for you on our Power Press.

SUMMIT.

Summit ahead of the world. We have one picket mill, E. Meek being the proprietor. He saws pickets for 1.50 a thousand.

Sugar making is the order of the day now.

Al. Franks, of Auburn, was on our streets last Saturday.

Misses Jennie and Martha Lutz, of Waterloo were the guest of Mrs. Viola Snowberger last week.

Mr. Dueby has a hoop factory.

Mrs. Kemp and Mrs. L. Marker, of Steubenville were the guest of Mrs. Henry Lawson last Thursday.

Miss Belle Cooper closed her school at Maple Grove last Friday.

Henry Lawson and wife were the guest of Joseph Rohm and family last Sunday.

BUTLER.

Our people were shocked as they have not been for many a day, on last Wednesday morning, when it was announced on the street that Mrs. Nancy Haskins, wife of George Haskins was dead She had been in her usual health on Tuesday and on Tuesday night her little daughter, Leah, was sick and she remained up with her until midnight, when she retired alone. Mr. Haskins got up about six in the morning, and spoke to her, but getting no answer he placed his hand on her head and discovered that she was dead, and although warm, appeared to have been dead for some time Her features bore a life like appearance as if death had been instaneous. No cause has been assigned by our local physicians The writer talked with her but a few hours previous to her death, when she appeared in usual health and spirits. Her funeral took place from the Disciple church last Friday, Rev. Laird officiating, and was attended by a large part of our citizens. Mrs. Haskins (Harn) was a highly respected lady, an excellent wife, an affectionate and tender hearted mother. She leaves her husband and little daughter Leah about eight years old, her aged and afflicted mother, who depended mainly upon her in her declining years, three sisters and three brothers and a host of friends to mourn her very sudden and unexpected death Mr. Haskins and his little daughter have the sympathy of all our people in this their sad and unexpected bereavement.

In our article last week upon the death of Dr. Miller, the typo made us say he lost his life on the "train," and he should have said on the "track." He also said he "ranched," with such cotemporaries etc, and he should have said "ranked" with etc.

The Bicycle Co, are working over time now, until 9 p m. They are about 1200 behind their orders.

The Basket Co. are also rushed with orders. They now own two basket cars, in which they ship about 60 per cent more goods than in the largest ordinary freight cars and receive a rebate in freight that helps materially to pay expenses.

The supporting of a newspaper costs any town scarcely a cent. Though papers may be well patronized and the business men may spend large sums of money in advertising, the cash very quickly gets back into the channel from which it came. Nearly every cent a paper gathers in is spent at home, and it goes to the merchants who delight in benefiting themselves and the community by liberal advertising. Boiled down, the facts are that a newspaper returns all the money it gets to those who gave it and its work for the town and county is thrown in as good will.

Not to be Trifled With.

(From Cincinnata Gazette.)

Will people never learn that a "cold" is an accident to be dreaded, and that when it occurs treatment should be promptly applied? There is no knowing where the trouble will end; and while complete recovery is the rule, the exceptions are terribly frequent, and thousands upon thousands of fatal illness occur every year ushered in by a little injudicious exposure and seemingly trifling symptoms. Beyond this, there are to-day countless invalids who can trace their complaints to "colds," which at the time of occurrence gave no concern, and were therefore neglected.—When troubled with a cold use Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It is prompt and effectual. 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by F. E. Davenport.

Congress is wrestling with the question of according belligerent rights to Cuba. It is quite likely that a resolution to that effect will pass both houses directing the president to issue such a proclamation. We do not believe this would help the Cubans so very much. If any extreme step is taken, it should go further and acknowledge Cuban independence at once, and fully. This might cause, trouble, but we will have to do this sometime, and we may as well have it over and stop the slaughter of this heathenish war.

Prof. E. Louis

The Well Known Psychopathic Physician to visit Auburn.

Prof. E. Louis, the Psychapathic physician, who has made such wonderful cure for the people of Angola and vicinity has arranged to visit Auburn on Thursdays of each week. He will be at the Swineford House where he will be glad to meet any who are sufferers in any way. The Proffessor has been in Angola for several months. At the end of the first five weeks of his stay in that city he had 189 patients. He certainly has gained the confidence of the people in his phenomnial cures. We have in our possession a list of thirty residents of Angola who have been cured by Prof Louis, and we also have been informed that many Auburn people have been told by Angola friends of his success and through them the Prof. has arranged to come to Auburn every Thursday.

THE BEST SPRING MEDICINE

SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR

IS SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR—don't forget to take it. The Liver gets sluggish during the Winter, just like all nature, and the system becomes choked up by the accumulated waste, which brings on Malaria, Fever and Ague and Rheumatism. You want to wake up your Liver now, but be sure you take SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR to do it. It also regulates the Liver—keeps it properly at work, when your system will be free from poison and the whole body invigorated.

You get THE BEST BLOOD when your system is in A1 condition, and that will only be when the Liver is kept active. Try a Liver Remedy once and note the difference. But take only SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR—it is SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR which makes the difference. Take it in powder or in liquid already prepared, or make a tea of the powder; but take SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR. You'll find the RED Z on every package. Look for it.

Mason in the presence of a large concourse of people at Lockwood chapel and the remains placed at rest in Evergreen cemetery.

Court.

Work began at the old stand yesterday as usual. Judge Penfield called to order at an early hour and soon had the boys at work. Charley Crew had charge of the court room and Frank Jones took up the tickets at the door of the grand jury room. The grand jury is in session and judging by the number of free and easies hanging around, they are having something to do.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, INDIANA.

JAMES A. BAKER, - - PUBLISHER.

A Buffalo woman snapped a loaded revolver at her husband "for a joke." He never saw it at all.

A Bangor, Me., woman went into a drug store in that town and asked for a bottle of "that Monroe docterin'." Even the children cry for it.

Gotham's latest census shows that there are 1,154 women in New York city who dont know how old they are. Probably there are not so many who will tell.

Lieut. Peary says he "found the Icelanders a cordial and familiar people." Our school geographers had taught us to believe they were cold and distant.

A dispatch from St. Joseph, Mo., says: "The policemen are patrolling the cemeteries." That's all right; some of those hustling Westerners have to be watched for awhile after they are dead.

Paderewski has a magnificent touch; there can be no doubt of that. Thirteen thousand five hundred dollars for two matinee recitals! There's nothing the matter with that sort of box office technique.

An Oakland, Cal., paper has far outstripped such defilers of the language as the inventors of "Sundayed," "suicided," "enthused," and the numerous perverters who fatuously think that lurid means red. It has brought back the atrocity, "debuted."

Because his horses could not pull his wagon out of the snow on South Water street, at Chicago, Emil Rau, the driver, lashed them until he was tired. After resting a while he went at it again, but was compelled to desist by one of his horses, which kicked him into a snow bank and broke his leg. It is one of the mysteries of nature why some animals, particularly the horse, are not conscious of their strength. If more of them were, and, when the opportunity presented itself, would retaliate in kind, there would be fewer brutal drivers. Mr. Rau may learn a useful lesson during his hospital confinement if he is so disposed.

A prominent citizen of Philadelphia, Mr. J. C. Strawbridge, has waked up to a realizing sense of the fact that that city has no fitting memorial of Benjamin Franklin, though the old philosopher was so intimately associated with it. Mr. Strawbridge, therefore, has given a commission to the sculptor, John J. Boyle, of the same city, to prepare a model of a bronze statue to cost $10,000, its artistic merit to be decided by a jury of three well-known artists. The Fine Arts League of the city will select the site. It is gratifying that a similar commission recently given in Chicago by one of its citizens has roused slow-going Philadelphia to a sense of its deficiency in this respect. Of all cities in the United States it is the one which should commemorate the career of Franklin.

His honor the president of the Transvaal will not trek to London. The Boers were at the point of the cape fifty years ago. The compatriots of Mr. Joseph Pushful drove them out more by bad manners than by violent arms. They moved north step by step, trekking, as they call it, their families and chattels through the desert to escape mere contact with the outlander. They braved the assegnis of the savage, fought, bargained, cheated, lied and massacred after the manner of pioneers. They won their empire from the aborigine, and they have shown by Majuba Hill and Krugersdorp that they can hold it against the alien. Why should Kruger go to London to confab with the pushful person? The experience of the King of Ashantee may be in his mind. That potent monarch having been invaded by the advance guard of British civilization, consented to parley with the governor of the Gold coast and was whipped off from his capital while the ambassadors whom he had dispatched to Downing street were ironed and sent to prison. It is a long trek from Pretoria to London. The Boer has made his last journey.

The failure of the oil steamer Wildflower, which sailed from Philadelphia for Rouen, on Dec. 11, to reach her destination or to turn up at any known port, lends probability to the report that she has been destroyed with all on board by an explosion of the oil which constituted her cargo. The sudden glare in the sky, followed by the dull roar of a heavy explosion, reported by the captain of the Loch Etive on the night of Jan. 6, off the coast of Ireland, describes the familiar phenomenon attending oil tank explosions, and to those familiar with fires in the oil regions will be accepted as evidence of the fate of the missing steamer. Fires and even explosions at sea were not unknown to the oil trade when all export oil was shipped in barrels or cases. Petroleum is an inflammable substance, whether confined in a gallon case, a fifty-gallon barrel, a 30,000-barrel iron tank or a million-gallon bulk steamer. It generates an explosive gas more easily ignited than gunpowder. In a vessel loaded with petroleum in cases or barrels a fire would cause a series of continuous explosions until ship and cargo were entirely consumed. A fire on board a tank steamer would be followed by one tremendous explosion which would destroy ship and crew simultaneously. The fire and explosion might be caused by a bolt of lightning, which is the most prolific source of oil fires and explosions in the producing regions, or a spark flame or lamp of any kind might become the agent of ignition on board. It did not require the now almost certain fate of the tank steamer Wildflower to convince those familiar with petroleum and its inflammable nature that the tank steamer was no improvement upon the old methods of shipping oil in the matter of safety from fire and explosion at sea. The tank steamer has doubtless reduced the cost of transportation materially; it has not reduced the fire risks. There will be explosions at sea as long as oil is a subject of ocean freightage, and the chances of explosion have been increased rather than otherwise by the adoption of the bulk method of transportation.

The Supreme Court of Illinois has recently decided a case which is of a good deal of importance both to railroads and to the traveling public. In the southern part of the State is a road known as the Cairo Short Line, a branch of which, fifty miles long, runs from Duquoin to Eldorado, the business on the branch being so small that the company ran only what are known as "mixed trains," made up of freight and passenger cars. The people living along the line of the road applied to the State Railroad Commissioners to order the company to run one train a day each way exclusively for passengers, and the order was issued. The railroad company denied the right of the board to issue such an order, and the case went to the Supreme Court, which affirmed the order of the Commissioners. The Court held that railroads are creatures of law and are intrusted with their powers to promote public interests, and are, therefore, bound to conduct their affairs in furtherance of the public objects of their creation. The Court held that "it cannot be said that the carrying of passengers in a car attached to a freight train is a suitable and proper operation of a railroad so far as the carriage of passengers is concerned." While this decision will be appreciated by many persons who have had to submit to being drawn across the country in mixed trains at the rate of ten miles an hour, not including interminable stops at way stations while freight is being loaded and transferred, it is a fact that many Western roads do not do a sufficiently large passenger business to warrant the running of passenger trains. This is a matter that a company ought to have considered when it asked for a charter, but having received privileges from the public such a company ought not to be permitted to treat the people as if they had no rights in exchange for the franchise they have given. Nor ought the company to subordinate the conveyance of passengers to the transportation of freight. The Court held very properly that carrying first-class passengers on a freight train was not in accordance with the laws of the State of Illinois nor with the rights of its people.

STUCK TO SPARTACUS STORY.

Congressman Hopkins Could Not See the Joker's Point.

Mr. Hopkins of Illinois is not altogether inaccessible to the subtlety of a joke, but in the main the tawny haired statesman is disposed to be serious and grave. Updegraff is a dry joker, and Lacey of Iowa is always bubbling over with the spirit of merriment. Some time ago, while Hopkins and Lacey were smoking in the house cloakroom the conversation drifted to the subject of gladiators, and Hopkins, in his serious way, began to extol the martial achievements of one Spartacus, not unknown to most readers, from juveniles up to gray-haired statesmen. In connection with a poem beginning:

"Ye call me chief. And ye do well to call him chief who for twelve long years," etc.

"You can talk about gladiators in tones of contempt," said Hopkins, "but Spartacus was a great general."

Updegraff was half asleep, stretched out on the lounge within ear shot. He caught Hopkins' remark and drawled out:

"You're mistaken about that, Hopkins. That wasn't Spartacus at all, but Cantharides."

"Oh, no," said Hopkins; "it was Spartacus."

"I tell you it was Cantharides," insisted Updegraff, provokingly; "I know what I'm talking about."

Updegraff and Lacey soon after left the cloakroom and took their seats. Updegraff knew Hopkins was right. But it amused him to be perverse. So far as Cantharides was concerned, it was the first word that popped into his mind. The two had occupied their seats but a little while when Hopkins marched down the aisle with Anthon's classical dictionary. He banged it down on Updegraff's desk and pointed to the history of Spartacus for verification of his assertion.

Updegraff looked at it, then at Hopkins, and in very dry tones said:

"That's right. That dictionary is responsible for that cock and bull story. There it is, sure enough. But I presumed, while it had misled so many, you, Hopkins, couldn't be taken in by that kind of authority."

Hopkins looked at him for a moment in blank amazement at such a display of human perversity, closed the book in disgust and stalked up the aisle.—Washington Post.

THE WICKEDNESS OF SLEEPING.

Some of the Notions Which Were Entertained Years Ago.

That idea was almost dominant in religious society sixty years ago, and sometimes assumed forms which, if not ridiculous, were at least quaint. It was, for instance, held to be wrong for any but the aged to sit in easy chairs, not, as is now vainly imagined, from any ignorant idea as to the injury done to the figure, but because "lolloping" betrayed a blameworthy tendency to ease and self-indulgence. That was the origin also of the extraordinary prejudice against taking any extra sleep. The old knew well that sleep, when sleep is not needed, is to the young the most wearisome of all obediences, but nevertheless they believed that to wish to sleep more than a strictly regulated time, which, according to modern hygeists, was too short, was a mark of sluggish self-indulgence, and it was visited, therefore, with moral reprobation.

Early rising was extravagantly praised, not because it lengthened the day, for the early risers went to bed early, but because it was disagreeable; and some curious rules of diet—for example, abstinence from sugar—were defended in part upon the same principle. We have known girls cut off their curls avowedly because they were proud of them, and men go about in shabby clothes, because, as they averred and believed, it was well by diminishing comfort to promote serious reflection.—Spectator.

"Hurry up, Maud. Mr. Jones has been waiting an hour already." "Humph! Let him wait. Didn't he keep me waiting three years before he spoke?"—Harper's Bazar.

SENATE IS FOR CUBA.

RESOLUTIONS FAVORING RECOGNITION ARE PASSED.

Belligerent Rights Are to Be Duly Accorded—Weyler Called a Butcher and Spain an Outlaw Nation—Galleries Break Out in Applause.

In Name of Humanity.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the opinion of Congress a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba; and that the United States of America should maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

Resolved, That the friendly offices of the United States shall be offered by the President to the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

Vice President Stevenson was unable to repress the wild enthusiasm with which the galleries responded to the floor when Cuba's cause was being argued before the Senate Friday, and in spite of all the rules, and threats to clear the galleries, the spectators applauded in every way when the final vote was taken, passing the resolutions which were intended not only to recognize the belligerent rights of the Cuban patriots, but also to express the sentiment of Congress that the time had come when Spain should grant independence to the island, either voluntarily or by the armed intervention of the United States.

Early in the afternoon, says a Washington correspondent, the sentiment among the Senators themselves apparently rose to fever heat, and it was easy to see that Cuba after many long delays had its day in court. The resolutions which were passed not only recognize the fact that there is a state of war existing in the Island of Cuba, but also in effect suggest that the friendly offices of the United States should be offered by President Cleveland to the Spanish Government in the direction of securing the independence of Cuba.

No one doubted that when the Senate finally got to work there would be a practically unanimous sentiment in favor of the Cuban insurgents, but recent events have hastened matters considerably, and the arrival of Cept. Gen. Weyler on the island with his prompt pronunciamentos of coming butchery and his past record in that direction stirred up even the oldest and most conservative Senators to a pitch of sympathy and enthusiasm which was as genuine as it was unusual in the Senate chamber.

ANOTHER PROMISE OF HELP.

An Impressive Scene.

There have been few more impressive scenes in that historic room than when Senator Sherman denounced the butcheries in the Island of Cuba, and declared it to be his solemn conviction that unless a stop were put to them no mortal power could prevent the people of the United States from themselves marching over to the island of Cuba and setting it free, without waiting for slow Govermental processes. When he expressed his opinion on the sympathy of the American public the galleries burst into a long roll of spontaneous applause, men and women uniting in their manifestations of approval. This is entirely against the rules of the Senate, but the Vice President and the Sergeant-at-Arms were powerless in the face of the people themselves who had come to see the first step taken toward Cuban freedom. At frequent intervals in the proceedings the galleries took part, in spite of all threats to clear the seats.

The vote of 64 to 6 is a sufficient indication of the feeling of Congress, for the Senate is always the more conservative body and least liable to be led away by popular clamor. As soon as the resolutions were passed in the Senate they were brought over to the House and were there received with cheers.

There was a good deal of careful maneuvering required to put the resolutions in a shape which would not embarrass the administration. Although the Constitution requires all resolutions to be submitted to the President before taking effect, it has been the custom of Congress not to send concurrent resolutions to the White House. They have been used only in expressing the opinion of Congress and are employed on matters which do not need legislative approval. In the present case it was desired only to express to the world that the American Congress was in favor of recognizing the Cuban patriots as belligerents, and also to put on record the belief that the time for securing the independence of the island was at hand. It was not desired to have them signed by the President, because if that were required it might embarrass him in his diplomatic correspondence with Spain relative to the possible independence of Cuba.

Congress the Responsible Body.

The stand taken by the administration throughout the Cuban affair has been that inasmuch as the United States have a treaty with Spain they are bound to observe its provisions. In his first message the President stated pretty clearly that the responsibility for any action, as far as Cuba was concerned, lay with Congress. All that he said was that Spain, being a friendly nation, must have the benefit of her treaty.

Friends of the President declare that he has never been other than willing to grant belligerent rights to Cuba, but that he is distinctly unwilling to assume responsibilities in the matter which should be shouldered by Congress. Congress alone can declare war, and the President is decidedly unwilling to take the initiative in a matter that may cause active hostilities with Spain. He is known to have declared himself recently to one of his friends in the Senate, and is represented as saying: "Let Congress pass a joint resolution declaring it wants Cuba recognized and Cuba will be recognized."

No one expects Spain to let the island go without a struggle, but it was considered to be the only proper thing for this country to do to make a peaceable proposition first and then, in case that were rejected, to secure independence by armed intervention if necessary.

Vest for Cubans.

A stirring speech by Mr. Vest in behalf of Cuba was the event of Thursday in the Senate. It came unexpectedly, and served to arouse enthusiasm.

The Senate had agreed that the final vote on the Cuban resolution would be taken at 4 p. m. Friday, and the debate was proceeding, Mr. White of California and Mr. Gray of Delaware contending as a legal proposition that the United States could not at this time recognize Cuba's independence. This aroused Mr. Vest, first for question, then for remonstrance, and then to one of the bursts of eloquence with which he at times electrifies the Senate. He spoke of Spain as the toothless old wolf who had had lost one by one all her litter, and was still clinging to this single remaining cub. He pictured Spain as the impotent giant of Despair in the Pilgrim's Progress, gazing on defeat. In impassioned words he apotheosized liberty in periods of rare beauty and fervor, adding with ringing emphasis that the Cuban patriots would never, never, never again become the unwilling subjects of Spain.

CLEVELAND'S BIRTHPLACE.

An Irreverent and Soulless Trolley Company About to Cut It in Two.

The little parsonage of the First Presbyterian Church at Caldwell, N. J., the birthplace of President Cleveland, is in danger of being demolished by an irreverent trolley company and a soulless corporation.

GROVER CLEVELAND'S BIRTHPLACE. (The dotted line shows where the track would come.)

The parsonage is a pretty wooden structure two stories high. It sets back from the road in Bloomfield avenue, as fine a driveway as can be found in New Jersey. Unfortunately this little house is in a direct line, according to the surveyors' plans, with the tracks of the trolley.

The church itself will not be interfered with, but the house will have to be razed to the ground to make room for the car tracks. The trustees of the township of Caldwell hold the right to a part of the principal thoroughfare, and they object to the destruction of this memorable spot. The North Jersey Traction Company, on the other hand, are fighting tooth and toenail for the trolley road franchise, and are leaving no stone unturned to secure it. The fight was begun in 1894, and is now about settled.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

DESTRUCTIVE INFLUENCE OF "PROTECTION" AGITATION.

Ridiculous Counter Claims by Republican Leaders—Have the Consumers No Voice in Tariff Discussion?—Hiding Behind Lincoln's Fame.

Business Men and the Tariff.

The business interests of the country, which during the past year have been rapidly recovering from the panic and bankruptcy which preceded the repeal of the McKinley law, are again threatened with a period of stagnation due to uncertainty in regard to future tariff legislation. When the Wilson law was before Congress the Republican press protested against any attempt to reduce the enormous taxes of the tariff of 1890, on the ground that tariff discussion tended to unsettle business and to prevent manufacturers from carrying on their enterprises. When it was a question of a moderate reduction in customs duties the high-tariff advocates insisted that agitation over rates and schedules brought trade and industry to a standstill, and for that reason the McKinley law should be "let alone."

But just as soon as the Wilson bill became law the Republican chorus changed its tune. Instead of allowing the industries of the country to secure a much-needed rest from the disturbing influences of tariff changes, the protectionists at once began a general clamor for a restoration of the law which the people had ordered repealed. Forgetting their declaration that the business interests needed to be let alone, they denounced the present 40 per cent. tariff as a "free trade" measure and blamed it for all the evils which had been caused by their own policy. By every species of false representation, appeals to sectional prejudice and short-sighted selfishness, they tried to stir up opposition to the new law, and succeeded in 1894 in electing a Republican House of Representatives. Ever since that time they have declared that as soon as they had the power the mistake of 1890 would be repeated, and the trade-restricting McKinley law again placed on the statute books. That the Dingley bill did not raise the duties quite as high as the tariff of 1890 was owing to the desire of the Republicans in Congress to pass a law which they could claim to be a purely revenue measure. It was known that even though passed by the Senate it would be promptly vetoed by President Cleveland.

Already the organs of the protected trusts and monopolies are boldly announcing that the sole issue of the coming Presidential campaign will be the restoration of the McKinley tariff or the imposition of even higher duties. This means that the country is again to be plunged into an agitation for high prices and increased taxation, and that the whole question is to be fought over again in the press, on the stump and in Congress. The commercial, manufacturing and transportation interests which suffered so much from the law of 1890 and the panic which it caused in 1893, should need no argument to convince them that under these conditions the unsettlement of business will be as great until some time in 1898, when a new tariff can be framed and passed, as it was two years ago.

The Wilson tariff should have a fair trial, and judging from the improvement in business during the past year, if left undisturbed, it would in a few years give us so great prosperity that there would be no excuse for changing it in the direction of higher duties. It is for conservative business men to say whether they want a period of quiet, with opportunities to carry on their business unmolested by tariff meddlers, or one of doubt, hesitation and uncertainty. If the former, they should at once declare their preference for the Democratic policy, and condemn the Republican threat to bring back the evils of McKinleyism.

Let the Consumers Be Heard.

Because a few hundred members of the National Manufacturers' Association have endorsed the McKinley tariff, the Republican press is boasting that the business interests of the country have declared for protection. On the assumption that the interests of the manufacturers should be the first consideration in framing tariff laws these organs of monopoly claim that the men who want to get higher prices for their products have decided the question for all the people. Of course it is very kind of these superior persons to save their inferiors the trouble of studying the tariff for themselves, yet there are probably not a few wicked free traders who will insist that the issue between protection and tariff reform has by no means been permanently settled, even by the wise men who recently met at Chicago.

One reason for this doubt on the part of the common people is their belief that while it may be a good thing for the manufacturers to get high prices, it is by no means so beneficial to those who buy things. The latter reason that if goods are made to cost more in order that a few men may get rich, somebody must lose what the manufacturers gain. And the fact that the men who have things to sell want high prices is of itself sufficient reason why consumers should look with suspicion on a tariff scheme which promises to make things dearer.

If the milkmen in a town or city were to declare themselves in favor of higher prices for milk, nobody would be surprised. But it would be very surprising if all the consumers of milk agreed that the milkmen's wishes must be deferred to. So with the demand of the manufacturers that they be allowed to dictate the tariff policy of the country. The sixty-five millions of consumers should have something to say, and in spite of the alleged business interests should vote down the party which advocates higher prices.

Congress and the Money Question.

The important fact is that the present Congress, like many of its recent predecessors, is incapable of meeting the situation. So far as it has had any influence at all it has been a hindrance rather than a help. The men who control it have persisted in giving more weight to their own fancies and prejudices than to the public welfare. No appeal that has been made to their patriotism has moved them. They favor or oppose a given piece of legislation not on its merits, but because of its influence on a certain other piece of legislation.—Indianapolis News.

Protection Run Mad.

The Chicago McKinley high protectionist organ insists, truthfully, that Abraham Lincoln was a protectionist. It specifies that he was an old-time Whig, a Henry Clay Whig, and therefore necessarily a protectionist.

But there is protection and protection. That which Henry Clay and the Whigs asked was discrimination by the United States in favor of American industries on the plea that they were infant industries and needed governmental support. They protested continually that just as soon as the infant was able to move upon his own legs that moment they were willing that all governmental interference in behalf of American industry should be withdrawn. In the measures they supported they never dreamed of going to the lengths to which McKinley has gone. When the war tariff was levied it was necessary for Morrill to explain that it was meant only for an obvious exigency and that as soon as peace was restored it would be the duty of congress to reduce the tariff. But McKinley has gone beyond anything anybody ever dreamed of in the way of making manufacturers special objects of Congressional interest and regard.

Never in this world did Henry Clay dream of taking, for instance, such an article as the outer garment, the dolman, cloak, mantle, or what you will, for women and children and placing thereon a duty of 60 per cent. plus a duty of four and one-half times the duty per pound on wool of the first class.

Abraham Lincoln was a protectionist and in defense of that atrocity he was not above using specious ad captandum arguments, false in intent and false in fact. He held forth to a supposedly intelligent audience the ridiculous assertion that a tariff tax is levied only upon the rich and that no American who does not choose to import a foreign fabric need pay a penny of tariff tax. He also held out the statement, which has not been repeated since Logan's day, that it is the foreigner who pays the tax. The marvel is that Logan, believing that to be true, did not so maneuver American legislation as to impose all the tax for the support of the United States upon the foreign manufacturer.

It is true that Abraham Lincoln was a protectionist, as all Whigs were, but it is also true that the protectionists of to-day — McKinley, manufacturers' agent, at their head—would make the hair stand on the head of an old Henry Clay Whig, appalled at the extreme to which protection has been carried.

A Great Loss.

Through the stupidity of the owners of the steamship St. Paul and the combined efforts of two wrecking companies the country has suffered a loss of at least $2,000,000. When the St. Paul went ashore in a thick fog, and it was thought possible that she might become a total wreck, the hearts of all good protectionists rejoiced. Here was the direct dispensation of Providence, which sent the fog so that the steamer might be lost and pounded to pieces on the Jersey sands. Then the steamship company would have to build another vessel, which would give employment to a great many iron-workers, shipbuilders, etc. This, according to McKinleyite doctrines, would be a blessing to the country, and would do on a small scale what a protection tariff does to a large extent—make "more work."

But the expected gales did not blow, and after ten days pulling and hauling the St. Paul was floated and taken to New York. There it was found that she had practically sustained no injury, and that a few weeks in the dry dock would put her in condition for her regular trips across the Atlantic.

Even the Republican papers professed to be pleased that the fast and handsome vessel had escaped destruction. Yet if she had been a total wreck it would have made "more work" for idle men. Why, then, was it a good thing that she escaped? If high tariffs are beneficial because they make more work by making it harder to get useful things, why would it not be fortunate if the St. Paul had been destroyed? It would be hard for McKinleyites to explain how the wrecking companies which hauled the steamer out of the sand did not take bread out of the mouths of idle ship-builders. If the Republicans in Congress are wise they will at once pass a law forbidding meddling tug owners to go to the relief of stranded vessels. This will soon make lots of work.

A Phenomenon in Trade.

A very curious and interesting phenomenon is the movement among tea merchants for a duty on tea. They seem to be of one mind in this behalf, and they have sent strong representations to Washington concerning it.

Curiously enough, they demand the imposition of the duty for the protection of the people against the inferior quality of their own goods. They say that good tea is never sent to a country which has no tea duty; that if a specific duty—so much on each pound without regard to quality—were imposed, we should import better teas, to the great benefit of the people, and at the same time make a welcome addition to the revenues.

Their own advantage is to come, they say, from the increased consumption of tea which would result from an improvement in its quality.

Scarcely anything in the history of tariff agitation is more curious than this demand of the tea men.—New York World.

A Foolish Complaint.

Some of the McKinley papers complain that the "politicians" are against him. It strikes us that the "politicians" are the ones who are booming the Ohio man. For no other candidate are there so many purely political influences at work. They are trying to stampede the country. Mr. McKinley's friends have set out on the theory that they must get the nomination for their favorite on the first ballot or not at all.—Des Moines Register.

SENATE AND HOUSE.

WORK OF OUR NATIONAL LAWMAKERS.

A Week's Proceedings in the Halls of Congress—Important Measures Discussed and Acted Upon—An Impartial Resume of the Business.

The National Solons.

The House Monday in committee of the whole, by a vote of 93 to 64, decided that none of the appropriations on the Indian appropriation bill for Indian schools should go to sectarian schools. The matter caused a warm debate. The Senate showed considerable interest in Cuban affairs, and circumstances attending recent bond issues, but nothing of importance was done.

The Senate, by a vote of 33 to 22, defeated the tariff bill Tuesday. The House passed the Indian appropriation bill, the sixth of the thirteen general appropriation bills, and sent it to the Senate. The House also passed without debate the Dingley bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to take and kill the Alaskan seal herd if a modus vivendi could not be concluded before the opening of the present season for the protection of the seals pending negotiations for permanent protection of the herds with the countries interested. After several bills of local importance had been passed Mr. Johnson, chairman of Elections Committee No. 2, called up the contested election case of Van Horn against Tarsney from the Fifth Missouri district. The House adjourned without taking any action.

The Senate was again the scene of stormy debate Wednesday, all occasioned by the bolt of the Republican silver Senators on the tariff question. The Cuban question received slight attention. The Van Horn-Tarsney contested election case from the Kansas City, Mo., district occupied the attention of the House, but was unsettled. The Senate amendments to the House bill to extend the time in which the Government under the act of 1891 can bring suits to annul patents to lands in railroad and wagon grants were agreed to. One of the Senate amendments reduces the extension from five to one year.

Both House and Senate on Thursday did little but get enthusiastic over Cuba. Reports of slaughter by Gen. Weyler of peaceful citizens in Havana, the seizure of the steamer Bermuda within the three-mile limit in New York harbor, and fiery speeches in both branches in favor of recognizing Cuban independence, all served to arouse the greatest enthusiasm. It is predicted that this Government will soon act, and that instead of simple belligerency, the actual independence of the island will be acknowledged. The House unseated Tarsney, of Missouri in favor of Van Horn, Republican. In the Senate the bill was passed for the construction of two steam revenue cutters to cost not to exceed $250,000 each, for use on the Pacific coast. The army appropriation bill carrying $23,279,000 was also passed.

Cuba had her day in the Senate Friday, when that body by a large majority passed concurrent resolutions favoring the granting of belligerent rights. The incident was attended by unusual excitement and enthusiasm, and at any expression favoring the insurgents the chamber was in an uproar. The whole day in the House was spent in the consideration of the Legislative appropriation bill and considerable progress was made.

CLERGYMAN GOES FOR THE RICH

In the Uprising He Will Carry a Musket for the Poor.

William Waldorf Astor, J. Pierpont Morgan, John A. Rockefeller, Russell Sage, the Vanderbilts, the Goulds, Henry Flagler, Moses Taylor, Hettie Green, John Jacob Astor and other very rich people were bitterly denounced on Sunday at the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn, by Rev. Cortland Myers, the pastor. The greed of the plutocrats is, the clergyman thinks, responsible for much of the ills that beset society. On this point he said:

"In sight of half-starved people in New York these men fought the income tax, because they would rather have the poor starve than pay it. The wealth of the land is speedily concentrating in the coffers of the few. In that is one of our gravest perils. Some day there will be an uprising and justice will lead this poverty-stricken mob to victory. In that event I shall carry a musket for the slaughter of selfishness and injustice and inhumanity. If riches come from the mint of dishonesty and cruelty and are kept in selfish hands they have passed through the furnace of hell. A coal trust, or some other inhuman scheme for the murder of the poor, now obtains the coolest chair in the finest house. Fine and imprisonment, according to law, ought to be inflicted upon J. Pierpont Morgan or any other man who, by diabolical and inhuman methods, accomplishes the suffering of millions of poor in order to increase his millions. I would a million times rather be Lazarus—yes! I would rather be one of the dogs at the gate than he."

A Chinese University.

A Vienna journal publishes a letter from a Shanghai correspondent saying that a Chinese university, after a European model, will soon be established in Tien-Tsin. Charles D. Tinney, an American, is to be the head of the university, one of the chief objects of which will be to cultivate technical science. The teachers will be foreigners and natives. The university is to be opened next autumn, together with a preparatory school. Several such schools are also to be established in different parts of North China. Great importance is attached to this educational revolution in China.

Take After Their Sire.

The children of the German Emperor inherit their father's love of everything military and anything connected with military affairs. A few years ago the Empress went to stay at Felixstowe with her children. They had hardly been in the place an hour when one of the young princes slipped into a shop to buy a toy. He was not long over his purchase, for he knew exactly what he wanted. The new toy was a large box of soldiers.

At Wilhelmshaven, Germany, the naval recruits were sworn in in the presence of Emperor William. His majesty made them a short address in the course of which he said: "The German navy is small in comparison with some other nations, but it is in course of expansion."

Following close upon the death of her son, Christopher Champlin Waite, at Columbus, is the announcement of the demise at Washington of his aged mother, the widow of the late Chief Justice Waite. She was about 76 years of age.

Scrofula

Infests the blood of humanity. It appears in varied forms, but is forced to yield to Hood's Sarsaparilla, which purifies and vitalizes the blood and cures all such diseases. Read this:

On March 10 and April 7, 1896, the North-Western Line (Chicago & North-Western R'y) will sell Home Seekers' excursion tickets at very low rates to a large number of points in Northern Wisconsin, Michigan, Northwestern Iowa, Western Minnesota, Nebraska, North Dakota and South Dakota, including the famous Black Hills district. For full information apply to ticket agents of connecting lines or address W. A. Kniskern, G. P. & T. A., Chicago, Ill.

Barometric Animals.

Cats or dogs in a house are, it is affirmed, trustworthy barometers to those who watch their movements carefully. If they are restless a change of weather, especially when a rain is coming, may be anticipated. The cause of this is that their skins are extremely sensitive to atmospheric influence, so that any change in the condition of the air irritates and oppresses them, causing incessant restlessness.

MEN GROPE.

A WOMAN SEES THE LIGHT.

She Best Understands a Woman's Ills.

[SPECIAL TO OUR LADY READERS.]

How gladly would men fly to woman's aid, did they but understand a woman's feelings, trials, sensibilities, and peculiar organic disturbances!

Those things are known only to women, and the aid a man would give is not at his command.

This is why so many women suffer.

Twenty years ago Lydia E. Pinkham gave to the women of the world the result of her years of study in the form of her Vegetable Compound,—a universal remedy for all female complaints.

She well deserves the title, "Saviour of her Sex." She saw the light of reason, and gave it to her suffering sisters.

All female diseases put forth their symptoms, such as nervousness, lassitude, paleness, dizziness, faintness, leucorrhœa, faltering steps, sleeplessness, bearing-down pains, backache, and consequent melancholy and the blues.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has for twenty years saved women from all this. Hear this woman speak:—

"Five years ago at childbirth I did not have proper attention. I became very weak; could lift nothing without bleeding from the womb, which was ulcerated badly. I was examined by a physician, and treated for a time, but was compelled to leave the city before I received benefit from the treatment. I decided then to give your medicine a trial. I improved rapidly on the first bottle of Compound, and now feel like a new woman. Ulcers have ceased to form on the womb as they did. I advise all women in any way afflicted with female troubles to take your remedies, and trust that my testimonial will be seen by friends who knew me when I was so sick, and that they may know I am now well, and that I owe it all to your Vegetable Compound." WOMAN'S HOME

SHE LIKES POLITICS.

WHILE there is a whole lot of talk about women going into politics, there are very few, so far, who have given much personal attention to the subject, outside of the professional agitators for the enlargement of "woman's sphere." In Kentucky, however, there is one notable exception to this rule in the person of Miss Corinne Blackburn, the youngest daughter of Senator J. C. S. Blackburn. This young lady has been with her father through some hard campaigns, notably the recent one in the Blue Grass State. She loves politics for the excitement, and is ever ready with suggestions and help. She is not a "new woman" in any sense of the word and despises that particular cult, but she is a first-class politician and has been of much assistance to the Senator.

Wherever he has gone she has gone also, and while he has been talking to the men she has been doing some valuable work in persuading the wives and sweethearts and sisters and mothers of voters that they should influence the male members of their families to cast their ballots for her father. She has a wonderful memory for faces and names, and this gift, so valuable in the game of politics, she has made much use of in her campaigning with her father. She has a very large circle of acquaintances, and those who know her are her friends ever after, for she has marvelous tact and a gracious manner which begets friendliness and confidence. Miss Blackburn is well informed on all the great questions of the day, but she knows better than to try to argue with men upon them. When a man begins to talk to her on the silver question, for instance, she says that she does not want that man to vote for her father because he takes a certain stand on the financial questions of the day, but rather because her father is honest in his convictions, a manly man and a true son of old Kentucky. Miss Blackburn is a great favorite in Washington society. She has made one or two trips abroad and has made some study of European politics and people.

A Woman's Telegram.

"It is false economy to attempt to save money by abbreviating telegrams, and I found it out to my cost," said a woman several days ago. "It happened in this way. My sister and I went to Florida by boat, several years ago, when there was an outbreak of typhoid fever in several Florida towns. My sister, Mary, was seasick all the way, and when we reached Jacksonville I telegraphed: 'Arrived. Mary ill. Return next boat.' We took the trip for the sea voyage, you know, and had no intention of staying in Florida. When our boat pulled in at the pier in New York I saw my brother-in-law and his whole family waiting for us. They looked solemn, and I said to Mary: 'Something's happened.' As we came down the gang-plank they rushed at us, and grabbing my sister, said: 'Why, Mary, is it safe for you to be up and dressed so soon?' 'Why not?' said my sister, in surprise. 'Why, because the fever is dangerous.' Then it came out that they had supposed from my telegram that Mary had typhoid fever. 'Why didn't you say sea sick, instead if ill, in your dispatch?' asked my brother-in-law. 'Because it would mean an extra word,' I answered. My brother-in-law had brought a carriage from up town to carry my sister home, and when he found that she wasn't sick he told me that, just as a lesson, I might pay for the carriage. It cost me $7, and since then I have written out my telegrams in full."—New York Sun.

New Device Is Electric Curling Tongs

A modern blessing for women is the electric curling-tongs. They can be attached at a moment's notice to an electric light wire, and are heated almost instantly. They remain at a constant temperature so long as required, or until the connection is cut off. All that is necessary in the employment of this contrivance is to remove the incandescent lamp from its socket, attach the cord of the iron to the socket in place of the lamp, and turn on the current. This simple and valuable device, so useful nowadays when fashion obliges nearly every woman to use curling-tongs on her hair, costs only $4.

Women's Reform Work in Prison.

Philadelphia women are just now interested in working among the prison inmates, and there are various guilds and societies devoted exclusively to that purpose. Once a week the heavy prison doors are thrown open and the "prison angels" go in to teach needlework, give kindly advice, or read from good books. The "twenty-four-hour cases," or women who are simply locked up over night to answer some minor charge, are made a special object of effort. The women engaged in the work are unanimous in the opinion that "it pays."

Moody's Tribute to His Mother.

At the funeral of his mother in East Northfield, Mass., the other day, Rev. Dwight Moody, the evangelist, moved a large congregation to tears by the touching tribute he paid to her life of self-sacrifice and devotion. He recounted the story of their early life of privation. "She made our home, poor though it was," said he, "the best place on earth to us. She taught us that poverty was no disgrace. During the first years of her widowhood she wept herself to sleep night after night, and we never knew of it until later years."

Mr. Moody told of the trying days after the father died, leaving the family bankrupt; how the creditors took all the property, even to the wood from the shed; how the children, himself included, had to stay in bed one morning until school time because there was no wood for a fire, but a neighbor brought a load of wood before night and the family was kept together. Turning to the face of his mother, and in the gentle voice which has turned thousands, he said, as he shook his head, "God bless you, mother; we love you still."

Women's Way.

A domestic wife is a blessing, but not if she is too domestic.

A wife is willing to be obedient, but she hates to be considered a slave.

When a woman says no she wants you to insist upon her saying yes.

A man will always respect a woman if he sees that she respects herself.

With a woman her soul should always be at least as well clad as her body.

If a married woman commences as a slave she will never regain her freedom.

A great many women transfer to their baby the love they once had for their husbands.

Even when a woman is in love she never forgets to see that her hat is on straight.

A woman should not be afraid to die. Why, just think! It relieves her of the marriage tie.

A woman who is a good cook can always retain the respect of her husband, if not his love.

A woman should be chary with her kisses and caresses, even to her husband. We get tired even of canvas-back duck if we have it every day.

A Venezuelan Beauty.

Venezuela, the South American republic which has excited much sympathy and discussion, is celebrated among travelers for the beauty of its women. They are graceful as young deer, with velvet skin and eyes that could give brilliancy to the stars. One of the regal beauties of Caracas is Senora Mercedes Tovar de Panting. She is tall, of queenly bearing and eyes and hair of a shade of blackness that is said by returned travelers to make the raven's plumage yellow by comparison. The Senora Mercedes, like all wealthy Venezuelan women, is highly educated and further polished by travel. It is the practice of the South American families to send their children to Europe or Spain for educational training, or import trained teachers in case it is desired to keep the children at home. Venezuelan women to the charms of their minds invariably add the attractiveness of personal beauty. There are few ugly ones in the country. It may be the effect of the climate, or merely the perpetuation of the graces of their great-grandmothers of far away Andalusia. The blondes are few and are almost always of Anglo-Saxon parentage.

New Woman as Elevator Girl.

The new woman has invaded another field of labor. She is going to be an elevator girl. Strange that some bright women did not think of it before. It is slow, conservative Philadelphia that introduces the elevator woman to an approving public. In the Young Woman's Christian Association Building, at Arch and 18th streets, are two young women pioneers at this line of work. They like it, too, and say it is not nearly so hard or so unpleasant as standing all day in a store. The association building is eight stories high, and there is a large amount of travel up and down the elevators. The restaurant on the eighth floor is patronized not only by the permanent and transient boarders of the association, but also by crowds of noonday shoppers.

Car Spotters in Petticoats.

On the Philadelphia car lines many register spotters are women, and the men are constantly on the lookout for them. As soon as they are known the tip is passed along the line, and the conductors point out the women to each other, and then take especial delight in forgetting to ring up fares and then making a note of the fact, and turning it in to the division superintendent. One woman spotter used to work the pin racket. She would stick a pin in a cushion in one pocket and another pin in another cushion in an opposite pocket when the register bell rang. One conductor with a too highly developed sense of humor was discharged for jumping off his car to buy a paper of pins, which he presented to her.

Bloomers Worn on Stormy Days.

Miss Fannie Leidesorf, of San Francisco, faced a storm the other day clad in bloomers. They were of navy blue cloth and fell well below the knee, where they were met by leggings of the same shade. The rest of the costume consisted of a black jacket, a black and yellow hat, and a black serge skirt lined with moreen, but not stiffened with it. Miss Leidesorf threw it over her arm when walking and dropped it when in stores. In the former position the hem of it did not reach the knees and it was the only clean skirt on the street.

INDIANA INCIDENTS.

RECORD OF EVENTS OF THE PAST WEEK.

Big Real Estate Deal in Lake County—Indiscretion Causes John Winslow a Lot of Trouble—Gold Find on a Farm Near Anderson.

Realty Sells for $2,000,000.

A $2,000,000 deal in Lake County real estate went on record Friday. The land purchased consists of over 2,000 acres in the sand-knob portion of Calumet township. It adjoins the old stock yards tract and borders on the shore of Lake Michigan. The tract has been owned by George T. Cline, an eccentric bachelor who makes his home in Chicago. He parted with his title to Theodore H. Schintz, an attorney of Chicago, for $2,000,000. Real estate men say this deal points to another big boom in that part of Lake County. Three deeds were recorded—the first for $540,000, the second for $260,000 and the third or $1,200,000. The land has no improvements whatever.

He Tries to Kiss His Tenant.

Mrs. Nettie Goodall, of Marion, was awarded $150 damages against Jonathan Winslow for false prosecution. The case has been in the Circuit Courts of several counties for some time. Mrs. Goodall is a young married woman, while Winslow is nearly 80 years old. Two years ago the Goodalls were tenants of Winslow. One day he came to collect the rent and attempted to kiss Mrs. Goodall. She threatened to sue him, but a compromise was effected by Winslow paying $250. Shortly afterward Mrs. Goodall brought suit against Winslow for assault and battery. He was acquitted and retaliated by causing her arrest for blackmail. After a time the case was dismissed. Then Mrs. Goodall brought the false prosecution suit. It was tried once, but the jury disagreed. The costs will amount to about $1,500. Winslow was formerly a quaker. He will appeal the case.

Indiana Farm Yields Gold.

Robert Spaulding, an old California gold miner, now owner of a large farm north of Anderson, found $70 in gold ore protruding from a bluff on his farm. The samples indicate it will run $70 or $75 to the ton. It was questioned whether the gold was really found where he said it was, and people flocked to the place to find that what he said was true. Several old miners were among those who visited the find, and say that the prospects are splendid. An Anderson capitalist who has had mining experience made an offer of $500 an acre for the twenty surrounding acres, but the offer was refused. Spaulding has the means and will develop it himself. He nailed all gates on his place and placed trespass signs everywhere.

All Over the State.

The religious organizations and Christian working bodies of Anderson circulated petitions asking the Council to enact an ordinance making it a misdemeanor for boys below the age of 16 to smoke cigarettes.

Victor, the 3-year-old son of Cornelius Bolinger, near Kokomo, fatally wounded himself in a singular manner. While seated at the dinner table the child in attempting to close a long-bladed pocket-knife by pressing the point against the table, received a wound that disemboweled him, producing a fatal injury, the blade having turned and entered the body, penetrating the bowels.

Some time ago Mrs. Elizabeth Noble, of Summitville, began to show signs of mental aberration. She was under treatment at a sanitarium in Indianapolis, but she failed to obtain relief and has become insane. Her delusion consists in her imagining she is a corpse and that she cannot walk or talk. She insists she is dead and that she has been for some time. She will be taken to the Richmond asylum.

A wealthy resident of Kokomo is going to move to Peoria, Ill., and will take his $60,000 house with him. The house is of stone and brick, and handsomely finished and decorated. It will be taken down very carefully, the stone, pressed brick, plate glass, mahogany panels, and every other part being carefully marked, and will be shipped by rail to Peoria and there reconstructed. The cost of moving the residence will be about $15,000.

J. W. Walker had a terrific struggle with a maniac in the jail at Muncie the other evening. Walker and William McAbee, from Royerton, who is mentally deranged, and Frank Angel, also demented, are confined in one large cage. McAbee at times snarls and acts like a mad dog. He pounced upon Walker and began sinking his teeth in his flesh and tearing out great chunks, the blood spurting all over the floor and walls. At first Angel sat in one corner, showing his enjoyment of the situation by laughing. He finally came to Walker's aid as Turnkey Casey arrived. Because of the overcrowded condition of the State insane hospital these dangerous subjects are kept in jails all over the State as in Muncie.

Great excitement was caused at the Central school building at Logansport the other morning by an encounter between two pupils, Edgar Nice and Wiley Rumell, in which the formed used a pocketknife with telling effect. Nice made a thrust at Rumell's left breast, which the latter parried with his left arm. In doing so he sustained an ugly cut on the forearm, extending from the wrist to the elbow. To escape a second thrust at his Breast Rumell turned his back and the knife struck him just over the shoulder blade, cutting a gash six inches downward and to the right. The wounds may result in paralysis of his left arm. After the second blow Nice escaped from the building, and, notwithstanding careful search by the police, has not been found. Rumell is 17 years of age and a son of Charles Rumell, a Panhandle engineer. Nice is 15 years old and the son of a Panhandle bridge carpenter. The boys quarreled over a girl with whom both are desperately in love.

At Brazil, Mrs. Mary Tate, colored, quarreled with her sister, Mrs. Louisa Rideoute. She came into court and accused her sister of arson. She says she is responsible for several serious fires of recent date.

Patrick Fitzgerald, of Laporte, whose habits have lost him a fortune, his wife and many friends, and who has served jail sentences for inebriety, wants to reform. In furtherance of his good resolutions the authorities have given public notice that any liquor dealer selling him drinks will be prosecuted to the full extent of the law.

A west-bound freight train on the Lake Shore road broke in two twelve miles east of Waterloo. Ten cars of coal oil ignited and spread flames rapidly, doing thousands of dollars of damage. There were several narrow escapes. All railroad traffic was suspended.

Albert Rothschild, a dry goods merchant of Tipton, this State, and apparently in prosperous circumstances, notified a relative in Cincinnati to take charge of his establishment, after which he suddenly and mysteriously disappeared. The relative found Mr. Rothschild solvent, with no financial embarrassments, and why he left is an enigma to his friends and associates.

Man Was Made to Mourn,

Perhaps, but rheumatism need not add to the calamities to which we are more or less subject, when there is such an efficient means of counteracting the dire complaint as Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. When the liver, bowels or stomach are out of order, or the kidneys or nerves troublesome, the Bitters is also an efficient remedy. It prevents and remedies all malarial disorders.

Peculiar Insurance.

A curious form of life insurance is springing up in French manufacturing towns founded on the idea that the longer a man lives the less he needs. It bears the peculiar name of La Fourmi (the ant), and provides for the payment of $1,000 to the heirs of a man dying before the age of 38, the payment diminishing to $510 at 51. A sum of $1 a month insures the payment. The idea seems to be, and it is not a bad one, that if a man dies young his children are likely to be in want, but that when he is 50 they will be able to earn a living for themselves.

Walter Baker & Co., Limited, Dorchester, Mass., the well-known manufacturers of Breakfast Cocoa and other Cocoa and Chocolate preparations, have an extraordinary collection of medals and diplomas awarded at the great international and other exhibitions in Europe and America. The house has had uninterrupted prosperity for nearly a century and a quarter, and is now not only the oldest but the largest establishment of its kind on this continent. The high degree of perfection which the company has attained in its manufactured products is the result of long experience combined with an intelligent use of the new forces which are constantly being introduced to increase the power and improve the quality of production, and cheapen the cost to the consumer.

The full strength and the exquisite natural flavor of the raw material are preserved unimpaired in all of Walter Baker & Company's preparations; so that their products may truly be said to form the standard of purity and excellence.

In view of the many imitations of the name, labels and wrappers on their goods consumers should ask for and be sure that they get the genuine articles made at Dorchester, Mass.

The year of the French revolutionary calendar began September 22, 1792. It had twelve months of thirty days each and five days at the end, called the "Sanscullolides." The months were divided into three equal decades. There was a four-year period called a "Franciade," with a six-days' feast at the end.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" are a simple yet most effectual remedy for coughs, hoarseness and bronchial troubles. Avoid imitations.

Probably the oldest married couple in this country are Mr. and Mrs. Louis Darwin of Black Falls, Wis., who are 105 and 101 respectively.

I shall recommend Piso's Cure for Consumption far and wide.—Mrs. Mulligan, Plumstead, Kent, England, Nov. 8, 1895.

The taste nerves are 2,000 times more sensitive to quinine than they are to sugar.

There is more catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment pronounced it incurable. Science have proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address,

Will Stop Growing Persimmons.

Persimmons are not sufficiently in demand in Eastern markets to encourage California fruit growers to cultivate the crop, and many growers have decided to stop raising them. The fruit sent East has been of fine quality and attractive appearance, but there has been little sale for it, and in most cases the shippers and dealers have lost money on it.

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills, which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge, that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, laxatives or other remedies are then not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

RIPANS TABULES

A well-known sporting man, who is too modest to allow his name to be printed here, relates the following experience: "I was out yachting on the Fourth of July, and I got very much exhausted, having to manage the yacht myself in a northeast gale. I did not have an opportunity to eat properly, consequently my stomach was very tired, so that when I did eat, I ate too much, and that resulted in a condition which was followed by severe neuralgia in my head. My experience with Ripans Tabules previously taught me that possibly the trouble might be remedied by treating the stomach. Before I had taken the third Tabule my neuralgia had gone, and I was feeling pretty well. I had neuralgia very bad, and I could feel those Tabules were working upon my digestive organs, and as they worked my head improved in sympathy."

Ripans Tabules are sold by druggists, or by mail if the price (50 cents a box) is sent to The Ripans Chemical Company, No. 10 Spruce Street, New York. Sample vial, 10 cents.

Mexican Election

Chicago Chronicle.

President Diaz of Mexico is to have more than one opponent as a candidate at the election which will occur in June It has been announced already that General Mariano Escobedo, the chief hero of the Maximilian war, will be a candidate against Diaz. Another now offers himself.

The third candidate in the field is Bernardo Reyes, a soldier and statesman of some prominence, but entirely inferior to Diaz or Escobedo in both capacities. In fact, he has not reached such conspicuity that his name appears in the current publications devoted to contemporary biography. He is essentially "a dark horse."

The president of Mexico is elected by universal suffrage, without the interposition of an electoral college as in the United States, or the senate and deputies as in France. Diaz has been elected without opposition each time he was a candidate. The vote was generally light as returned through the machinery of the state governments, and the election laws provide no protection against fraud But there is no reason to doubt the honesty of the elections and the returns in all cases.

Diaz is a great practical politician as well as a soldier and statesman. It is not impossible that Reyes has been brought out as "a favorite son" in the interest of Diaz to baffle and defeat Escobedo by dividing his vote, as Cullom was brought out in Illinois to prevent the election of McKinley delegates, Diaz keeps close watch of politics in the United States and may have taken a lesson in machine methods from Platt, Quay and Tanner.

Rev. L. C. Littell.

Many of our people, and those in Waterloo will remember Rev. L. C. Littell who was pastor of the Presbyterian churches at the two places in 1868 to '70. Since leaving here he has entered the field of literature though still in the ministry. We have at different times, seen bright little poems from his pen, and the anniversary of Washington's birthday, Saturday, brought out another which we clip entire from Saturday's Chicago Record, believing our people will be pleased to read it.

FEB. 22.

Bright natal day, a hearty welcome here!
No joy-bells rang in the sweet long ago,
When our dear Washington was born, but lo,
We love him now—regard him as the peer
Of any son of earth. Of all the year
No other month can boast so proud a day;
Freedom upon it hung, as flowers in May
Upon a tree. An empire didst inhere
In thee, child of the skies, forever blest.
The torch of liberty burns brighter now,
Grow dearer still while ages pass and bow
Before the scythe of time. Thus 'mid unrest
Shall live undimmed our hero's fame and day
Till fettered millions walk sweet freedom's way.

REV. L. C. LITTELL,
Rushville, Ill.

That Apportionment

There is no likelihood that Governor Matthews will call a special session of the legislature to make a new legislative apportionment. If the present legislature was elected under an apportionment law that was unconstitutional, how could they make a constitutional law? Again as the constitution makes it impossible for the legislature to pass such a law at its regular session, how could they pass it at a special session? Either this legislature is a legal body or it is not. If it is a legal body it is because it was properly elected and in such a case the hold over senators are legally entitled to serve, and they are the ones over which we are quarreling. The law of 1885, under which we must elect this fall, if no other change is made, is as fair a law as we ever had or are likely to have, no matter which party is in power and makes the law. Every party makes an apportionment law to benefit itself, and there is no use lying about it by claiming that this party or that will make a fairer apportionment. The sensible way for Indiana to do, is to elect a legislature of good men and let them make the apportionment next winter as the constitution requires.

New Invention

It is a poor year when Auburn or DeKalb county does not put forth some new and useful invention or idea. This thought struck forcibly, the other day as we saw for the first time, a new school appliance invented by W. H. Zeigler, one of the teachers in our country schools. It is on a lead quite different from anything we ever saw, and we feel sure it will prove useful. At first sight it reminds one of the arithmetic frames that are sometimes used in primary work But this soon impresses one, that it is much more than an "abacus" and intended to cover a much wider field of work. It is a frame, in the first place, having wires drawn across from side to side, on which any desired object may be placed. But at each side of the frame, and facing the pupil is a narrow, upright blackboard which is to be used to assist in such lessons as deal with numbers. In this way, groups of objects shown on the wires may have their corresponding figures written opposite the wires, on the blackboard, and the pupil thus combines an object lesson with his written work. The possibilities of such a device for the teaching of numbers can at once be seen, especially by a teacher, but in a written article we can carry this branch of the subject no farther.

But there is a still broader field of work for this little device. It can be as readily used for a geographical purpose, including lessons as to the productions of a country, whether of the animal, mineral or vegetable. Thus, suppose the teacher wishes to show the vegetable productions of different countries, he puts on the wires what will say, the chief nuts that are useful to man. For our own country he could use walnuts, hickory nuts, pecans, chestnuts, etc. For Brazil, would be Brazil nuts. For England, English walnuts etc,etc. As each of these groups were brought into view the pupil could be called on to name the country represented, etc. And so on with other productions. And where the product could not be used as in case of animals, the printed or written name, or picture could be used in the same way. And in any case, these objects could be used, as we have said, to vary the work in primary arithmetic. And so many variations could be secured. Thus, to show that the things added, etc, must be of the same kind, we could have 2 walnuts and 3 walnuts, making 5 walnuts; but 2 walnuts and 3 pecans would not be 5 of either kind, but the result could be used to explain this point, and the use of abstract numbers.

We cannot more than allude briefly to the many uses to which the device could be put in school work, in an article like this. One must see the machine in use to understand its possibilities. Mr. Zeigler has obtained a patent on it, and expects to manufacture them, either alone, and to have some one undertake the work with him. The device has been submitted to such experienced school workers, as Mr. Marics, Mrs. W. B. Campbell and others whose experience would enable them to understand its value, and these give great encouragement.

The Road Man Of Texas

One of the features and a most valuable medium to the isolated settlers of the Lone Star State is the Road Man. Equipped with a team of wiry mustangs, and wagon, whose capacious interior is filled with the many necessities of pioneer life—from the tiny rattle for the baby to the calico for the dress, canned fruits, etc., and last but not least medicines most needed by the dwellers whose neighbors are often miles away. The road man is shrewd and knows a good thing when he sees it, Mr. G. G. Lincoln is a road man and he writes under the date of Feb. 16, '96, "I had the good fortune to come into possession of a package of your Catarrh Balm, and although I have been troubled with catarrh for several years, I can say that it cured me. I think it is the greatest catarrh medicine out. I am a road man. Since using your remedy I have told several people where I travel and these would buy it if I had it. At what price can you sell it to me in quantity—My Sunday point is Paris, Texas, for the next two Sundays." Pretzinger's Catarrh Balm is indorsed by all who give it a trial and its worth is becoming known far and wide. Sample sent for two cent stamp, or a full sized package for 50 cents by Pretzinger Bros., Chemists, Dayton, Ohio.

New Fruits From Labrador

In spite of latitude and Arctic current Labrador is the home of much that is delicious in the berry world. Three varieties of blueberries, huckleberries, wild red currents, having a pungent, aromatic flavor, unequalled by the cultivated varieties, marshberries, raspberries, tiny white capillaire tea berries, with flavor like some rare perfume, and having just a faint suggestion of wintergreen; squash berries, pear berries and curlew berries the latter not so greatful as the others, but a prime favorite with the Esquimaux, who prefer it to almost any other; and lastly, the typical Labrador fruit, which excepting a few scattering plants in Canada and Newfoundland, is found nowhere outside of the peninsula—the gorgeous bake apple. These cover the entire coast, from the St. Lawrence to Ungava. Their beautiful geranium-like leaves struggle with the reindeer moss upon the islands, carpet alike the low valleys and the highest hilltops, and even peew from banks of everlasting snow. Only one berry grows upon each plant, but this one makes a most delicious mouthful. It is the size and form of a large dewberry, but the color is a bright crimson, half ripe, and a golden yellow at maturity. Its taste is sweetly acid, it is exceedingly juicy, and so delicate that it might be thought impossible to preserve it.—Outing.

Jacob Kandel

The subject of the sketch was born Dec. 27, 1821, in Otterbach, near Kaiserlautern, New Bavaria, Germany, and died at his home in Richland township, DeKalb county, Ind., Feb. 24, 1896 at the age of 74 years, 1 month and 27 days.

Mr. Kandel was baptised in infancy and united by confirmation with the Evangelical Protestant church. In 1846, he was united in marriage at the same place, to Catharine Wirth, who survives him. To them were born seven children, four sons and three daughters; of these, three sons, John P., Peter G., and Eli S., and two daughters, Catharine, wife of John Grogg and Anna wife of David Shull, survive him. They came to America in June, 1859, and settled near Tiffin, Seneca Co., Ohio. In 1862 they moved to this county and at first settled near Feagler's Corners but the next year moved onto the farm which has since been his home, and where his widow still resides. While at Tiffin he had united with the Reformed church, and after coming here, they had been faithful members of the German Reformed church of this place.

Mr. Kandel had always been a man well esteemed for his sterling good qualities, and his neighbors all attest his his worth as a citizen and friend, as they showed during his illness of the past year, a part of the time of which he was confined to his home. And for all these tokens of neighborly kindness and sympathy, Mrs. Kandel and all the children wish to return heartfelt thanks.

The funeral was at the Lutheran church in Auburn, Feb. 26, at 11:30. The services were conducted by Rev. Geo. Engelman of the Reformed church and Rev. J. D. Broey of the Lutheran church. The interment was in Woodlawn.

Michigan City.

Our only Indiana Lake harbor is before Congress again for an appropriation This time they want $225,000, to complete the improvements for the harbor, Speeches were made by Mr. Gallagher, an attorney of Michigan City, and by Congressmen Henley and Hatch. Data were submitted to show that the Michigan City port was fortieth in point of tonnage in a list of 150 ports for which the government had appropriated money. Some of the work on the inside harbor had been lagging for twenty five years, what was needed was its completion which had been recommended by Engineer Lydecker, in charge of the government work. The committee will ask for $5,000 to purchase a fog-horn for the port. What's the matter with sending our own Fog Horn Kelley down there? We have no harbor to use him on in this corner of the state.

Cash Politics.

"Sugar democrats" are what they call a lot of democrats down in Louisiana who have gone over and joined the republicans, united with them and the populists to form a combination ticket in favor of a big sugar bounty. This is "practical politics" with a vengeance. The men who makes sugar want the government to put its hand into the people's purse and pay them extra for each pound of sugar they make. Is it not about time that northern and western farmers petition government to have a law passed to pay us an extra 30 cents a bushel on our wheat? The wheat crop is more valuable than the sugar crop, and a thousand times as many farmers would be benefited. If we get 60 cents now from the buyer, for all we sell to them, and 30 cents more from the government on all we raise, whether sold or used, that would be a pretty soft snap for northern farmers. But it is just what the sugar men are asking for with sugar worth about 4 cents a pound on the plantations, 2 cents a pound bounty, would add, one half to its orginal value. In the same way, a bounty of 30 cents a bushel on wheat would add one half to the original selling price of our wheat. Then we would receive from the buyer and the government together about about 90 cents a bushel. Perhaps some one will ask where the government will get this vast sum of money to be paid in bounties on wheat. The answer is, they will get it just where they got the bounty for the sugar, from the pockets of the whole people, all over the country. It is a steal in either case, but if we are to let them steal from us, why should they not be willing to have us steal from them.?

$20,000 For Short Stories.

The publishers of McClure,s Magazine have decided to spend twenty thousand dollars for short stories during the coming year. They announce that new writers will be especially welcome. Payments will be made on a very liberal scale, and it is believed that this will be more satisfactory than offering prizes. Stories should run from 2,000 to 6,000 words. The shorter the story, the better chance of success.

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

CHINATOWN.

At San Francisco, One Of The Most Curious Places.

Of all curious places on the continent San Francisco holds that sort of thing in the form of a Chinatown which is the largest in the United States. The writer has taken occasion to go among these people again and again, to talk with them and to observe their manner and method of living and doing business. In a business way they are very shrewd and socially are pleasant and courteous.

Chinatown in 1892 had a population of 50,000, celestials of all ages and classes. The hard times in this country since that date has caused many to return to the Empire, until at present only about 25,000 are left in these densely built quarters. In conversation with some of these merchants we learn that those who have returned to China, have, with few exceptions, done so for good and will not come to this country unless business brings them back They say "business here velly bad. Chinaman no makee money. Sellee heap littie." Among their business houses are boot and shoe houses and factories, cigar factories, tailor shops, brokers, drug stores, long distant telephones, opium joints, barber shops, meat shops, and vegetables, restaurants, theaters, joss houses, secret societies etc. etc. Woo-on-tang, Ching Kee & Co. are jobbers and manufacturers in cigars and tobaccos. Quong, Fat & Co. have wholesale and retail fancy goods and notions of native ware. It would tire your readers to hear all the firm names. The residence of the Chinese families are invarably in the upper stories of the business quarters and when once in these apartments one would seldom find his way out without a guide. These folks eat, sleep and live in a small space of about four blocks built up from underground haunts to the garrets, some three to six stories above the ground, a population of which would usually cover some one or two hundred acres, when occupied by the Americans. Upon the streets are seen these quaint little doll-like women with their children exquisitely dressed in oriental style, always bareheaded, with the exception of customary ornaments of embroidery which is worn around and about the the head. The Chinese lady has probably the smallest feet of any, nationality, the bottom of the shoe covering not more than two and a half or three inches in length, all of whom wear the boat or rocker fashion. Their costumes are universally of silk for which the Chinese are noted. Their New Years day has just been celebrated at which time they burn much powder in the form of Fire Crackers and generally make life and noise "for the tourist most hideous," with the sound of kettle drums, cymbals, the fiddle of two strings and one other instrument blown from the end. They are very liberal on such occasions and give away many things in line of novelties, as presents. The Chinese funeral always has this band of doleful noises in the procession and a roasted pig carried on a stretcher to place over the grave of the departed "for the devil to feed on, instead of the body that is laid underneath for rest and peace." To insure further peace to the dead body joss sticks or punk, are placed upon the graves to burn the incense to keep away the evil spirits. The graves of the departed are visited with frequence and a fresh supply of joss sticks are set burning in small vessels which hold the sacred ashes.

Chinatown has its schools and missions where the young heathen may receive instruction in English in its various branches. Some speak good English and write well, and they say our language is much the easier of the two, to acquire, one of their characters meaning as much as the whole English alphabet. Much might be said of that which goes on at night in this quaint village on the Pacific Coast, some of which was included in an article (A Night in Chinatown) in November 1892 at which time we went through it from the opium joints to the garrets and were held up by a hatchet in the underground haunt.

How the Earth Loses Time

The explanation of Lord Kelvin's estimate that the "set-back" of the earth in its daily rotation round its axis amounts to 22 seconds per century, is reported to be that such retardation is owing to the friction caused by the tides, the latter acting as a brake, and such action is calculated, according to the same authority, to be equal in weight to some 400,000 tons applied on the equator. Other causes, he says, have also to be taken into account, as, for example, the increase in the size of the earth, due to the falling on it of meteoric dust, which, if deposited at the rate of one foot in 4,000 years would produce the observed retardation by itself. Further, such a phenomenon as the annual growth and melting of snow and ice at the poles, by abstracting water from the other parts of the ocean, introduces irregularities into the problem, the abstraction accelerating the earth's motion, the melting, by restoring the water, retarding it.

Golden Rod.

The lovely golden rod has been accused of many offenses like causing hay fever, and other ills that flesh is heir to. But here comes a new kick, this time from the West:

Dr. Scott, state veterinarian of Wisconsin, has given a recent opinion that the common plant known as golden rod and so eagerly sought for decorative purposes, has been the direct cause of the death of many horses that have fed upon it in that state recently.

Seed Oats For Sale

At Bachtel's gristmill in Auburn, also at J. Loewenstein's in Waterloo. Headache Destroys Health

Resulting in poor memory, irritability, nervousness and intellectual exhaustion. It induces other forms of disease, such as epilepsy, heart disease, apoplexy, insanity, etc.

Dr. Miles' Nervine Cures.

Mrs. Chas. A. Myers, 201 Hanna St., Fort Wayne, Ind., writes Oct. 7, 1894: "I suffered terribly with severe headaches, dizziness, backache and nervousness, gradually growing worse until my life was despaired of, and try what we would, I found no relief until I commenced using Dr. Miles' Nervine. I have taken five bottles and believe I am a well woman, and I have taken great comfort in recommending all of my friends to use Nervine. You may publish this letter if you wish, and I hope it may be the means of saving some other sick mother's life, as it did mine."

The World's Date Line

MR. EDITOR:—The explanation of Uncle Sam's farm in the COURIER is very interesting and instructive to me and perhaps to many others. This made me think of the International Date Line. This line too is in the Pacific Ocean and marks the boundary between places settled by men who sailed from the east, and also by men who sailed from the west.

When it is Sunday west of this line it is Saturday east of it. There seems to be an impression that 180 degrees east or west from Greenwich is the point at which this change occurs. This is however not the case. The line is a very irregular one, located mainly in the Pacific Ocean and extending from pole to pole. Along this date line dates must be made later by one day by crossing it from the east to the west, and earlier by one day when crossing it from the west to east every 24 hours. Suppose a person starting from any given meridian at the moment of sunrise on Monday morning and were able to travel due west with the same speed that the earth revolves eastward on its axis. He would make the journey around the earth in exactly 25 hours. Twenty-four hours of time have elapsed, but to this traveler the sun has been on point of rising all the time, and to him it would be Monday morning, while to his family it would of course be sunrise Tuesday morning. He has apparently lost a day. Now suppose he were to start at noon on Tuesday and travel eastward at the same rate of speed with which the earth revolves eastward on its axis. He would make the journey around the earth in twenty-four hours. It would be noon when he reached the opposite of the earth, and noon again when he returned to the place of starting. He would have three noons in twenty-four hours. On his return it would seem to him to be Tuesday noon, though his family would assure him that it was Wednesday noon. He would apparently have gained a day by traveling eastward. For every degree one travels westward it is necessary to turn back the hand of a watch four minutes, and for every degree traveled eastward the hand should be set forward four minutes in order to keep the time of the meridians crossed. Every traveler on east and west lines, even comparatively short journeys is aware of this gain or loss of time. When we travel around the earth in either direction there is a difference in time of one day, the result being the same regardless of the rate of speed. To avoid this confusion of dates some line has been determined upon at which eastern bound travelers add a day and westward bound travelers drop a day from their reckoning. This line is what is meant by the Date Line. The calendars used in the civilized world originated in Rome. Communications from Rome westward would naturally be considered earlier in time at the same instant, while eastward communication would be considered later at the same instant.

The date lines would occur wherever these communications met. To the western part of Europe, the islands of the Atlantic, to South America, and the greater part of North America communications from Rome came westward The date lines could therefore not be placed in the Atlantic or in America. To the eastern part of Europe and to Asia, communications from Rome came eastward.

The date line was therefore established in the Pacific Ocean between island that received dates by eastward and westward communication. To illustrate this in the case of Alaska: Alaska, (as Russian America,) received its dates from the west, corresponding with those of America and Europe. Russian Americans and British Americans therefore differed as to the day of the week. Here was a clear date line causing confusion.

When Russian America, now Alaska, was purchased by the United States, the day that was Sunday by the Russians was Monday by the Americans. But now the date line has been pushed out into the straits and Alaska conforms to the rest of North America or the United States. It will be seen that this date line cannot be located on any particular meridian. The present approximate trend is as follows:

Beginning at the North Pole it passes through Behring's Strait, west of St. Lawrence island, thence southwesterly between the Aleutian Islands and Asia. Then still southwestwardly east of the group of Kurile Islands, then just east of the Japan Islands, Jesso and Niphon, keeping west of Guadaloupe and Margaret's Island, but east of Loo Choo and Fatchoo Islands and southeast of Tormosa. Then through the Bashee channel just north of the Bashee Islands. It enters the China Sea east of Hong Kong, then passes south just west of the Philippine Island and keeping east of Palawan Island. Then taking a southeasterly course, passing through the Sooloo Island, south of Mindanao and north of Gilolo. Here it passes east nearly parallel with but just north of, the equator to the north of Schank Island, thence southeasterly, leaving Gilbert Archipelago and the DePeyster Group on the northeast. Thence to the Samoan Islands, where it turns south keeping of Navigators, Friendly, Tonga, Kermadec and Curtis Islands and west of the Society and Harvey's Islands. Then it continues south bearing somewhat to the west so as to cross Chatham Island, thence to the South Pole. By connecting these points on a map you may readily trace the International Date Line.

H. A. WINSLOW.

DEAD.

John Bair was born April 11, 1837, in Wood county, Ohio, and died at his home in Fairfied township, DeKalb county, Indiana, March 2d, 1896, aged 58 years, 10 months and 21 day. He, with his parents, Samuel and Elizabeth, and several brothers and sisters, came to Indiana in the autumn of 1855, and located in the above named place. The next year he returned to his native state for a time to learn a trade, which was that of a carpenter; accomplishing that he again made this his home. On May 18th, 1865, he married Willimina E. Bower of Noble county, this state. To them were born four children, James A., Frances E., Vesta E., and Leslie A.; only three are now living, Vesta having died Feb. 26th, 1876, being but 9 months and 26 days old. The deceased was a kind husband, good father and an obliging neighbor. Honest and upright. he lived a moral life in its strictest sense, but during his lingering illness he realized that he had missed the "one pearl of great price," and began seeking it: it was not in vain, for he was happily converted, and united with Evangelical Lutheran church. He left bright evidence of his soul's eternal welfare, for in almost his last conscious moments he said: "Oh, I am so glad I have found Jesus." Surely life was not a failure with him. He leaves a sorrowing wife, three children, four brothers and two sisters, a numbers of distant relatives, and many warm friends to mourn his departure, but they need not mourn as for those having no hope for their loss is only his gain. The funeral rite was held at the Fairfield Center church, by Rev. Burket, of Kendallville, Rev. Elson, of Fairfield Center, and Rev. W. D. Trover, of Auburn, who delivered an excellent discourse from a thought contained in the 30th verse of the 19th chapter of St. John: "It is finished." The remains were laid to rest in the beautiful cemetery near by on March 4.

Women To The Front

In Decatur, Mich., the population of which is 1,500, the president of the Village Council is Mrs. Alma Sage, and all of the town offices, except that of dog catcher, are filled by women. Mrs. Dr. Kinney is one of the leading physicians. Mrs. Ada Gregg is a preacher and her church, the Advent, is taken care of by a janitoress, Mrs. Barnett. The restaurant of the town is conducted by Mrs. Crane and Miss Haines. The biggest store in the place is owned and kept by Mrs. Mary Shood Mrs. Nicholson is the postmistress. Miss Clara Hotaling is a shoemaker, and a good one. May Percival is a furnituremaker. Miss Anna Pardnett makes harness. Mrs. Carpenter is a florist. Mrs. Childs is a carriage painter. There are several women painters, weavers and brokers. The women control the saloons, and the only things to drink are soda and pop. In a village near by there is a woman undertaker.

Garden Seed.

Congress has been trying to punish Mr. Morton, the secretary of agriculture because he refuses to buy garden seeds for the congressmen to send out to their constituents. Morton says the whole thing is a waste of money, and he objects to throwing it away. He says the original object of the law, was good, because it aimed to secure new kinds of seeds, plants, etc, not then raised in this country. But of late years, he says the money has been used to buy common seeds, such as onions, cabbage, beets, radishes, and like, all of which can be easily procured, and cheap also, by those who need them. And he calls attention to the fact that when government buys these very common things, it has to pay enormous prices for them. Just as an object lesson for congress and for his other critics Secretary Morton recently bought a quantity of seed for $15 which the government has been paying $300 for. He wanted to let the people know how it was costing them to furnish seeds for congressmen to send out to tickle one in twenty of their constituents and gain a little favor at public expense.

Boys Entertain.

Saturday's Daily.

Last night the boys of Miss Flora Hoffman's Sunday School class entertained the ladies of Mrs. Hanna's class at the elegant home of Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Snyder on North Main street. At an early hour light refreshments were served by Mr. and Mr. Snyder after which they with Mrs. Hanna left for the Swineford House leaving the young people by themselves. The boys assisted by Miss VanDoren entertained th ladies with a short literary programme.

The party consisted of:

Mrs. Sam Hanna, Misses, Ethel Rufner, Ethel McKay, Ethel Hodge, Alma May, Rowena Tefft, Maud Trover, Lizzie Otto, Gertie Caruth, Nellie Franks, Maud VanAuken and Flora Hoffman, and Messrs. Paul Davenport, Phil Gibson, Dell Gibson, Roy McDowell, Chas. Schaab, Ed Little, Harry Lewis, Jim Simmons and Ora Snyder.

Failure.

The General Store of Hess & Son of Pesdent Lake Failed Yesterday

Thursday's Daily.

The general store of Hess & Son at Pleasant Lake failed yesterday. This firm has done business in that place for number of years and the announcement surprised mayn people. I. O. Bachtel furnished them flour and the firm owes him about $30.00. Though Mr. Bachtel sold it on commission and can lose nothing. Ed. Bishop also is interested to the extent of several thousand Dingers. Mr. Bachtel and Mr. Bishop went up there to-day to investigate the matter.

An Editor.

Of Clarence, Iowa, Mr. Clark Smith, writes: "Since the agency of your Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin was established here I have been a user of what I can call "that excellent medicine." For a year or more I have been troubled with constipation, indigestion, dyspepsia, etc., and I find that this remedy is just what I have needed," For sale at Davenport's drug store. 10-13

Not to be Trifled With.

(From Cincinnata Gazette.)

Will people never learn that a "cold" is an accident to be dreaded, and that when it occurs treatment should be promptly applied? There is no knowing where the trouble will end; and while complete recovery is the rule, the exceptions are terribly frequent, and thousands upon thousands of fatal illness occur every year ushered in by a little injudicious exposure and seemingly trifling symptoms. Beyond this, there are to-day countless invalids who can trace their complaints to "colds," which at the time of occurrence gave no concern, and were therefore neglected.—When troubl d with a cold use Chamberlain's Congh Remedy. It is prompt and effectual. 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by F. E. Davenport.

Willing To Work

Dr. L. A. Hines is setting an example that should be valuable to several hundred young men we know of. It is asserted that in the time he is not away on professional calls, he helps fire and do similar work in the sawmill If all would do this there would be fewer of the unemployed. He has made himsely a thorough physician we are told but is temporarily "laying off" at least partly, as his trip to Cuba compelled him to relinquish his partnership here. It pays for a young man to realize that there is more than one thing he can turn his hand to. And if he cannot get his chosen work he should keep busy at something else. It is no disgrace to follow any honest toil. On the contrary it is honorable.

To The Public.

The firm of Morr & Baker has dissolved partnership, and by aggreement all outstanding accounts belong to S. F. Morr and must be paid to him individually or they will not be considered paid. And about the 10th of March will open our room with a full line of farm implements including Osborne Binders and Mowers, hay rakes, tedders, disc, spring and spike-tooth harrows, Hake high arch cultivators, walking, Krause riding cultivators, Bissell riding and walking breaking plows. Also handle Zimmerman buggies and Shaffer wagons. Room next east of National Bank Block formerly occupied by Snell's grocery.

Don't fail to call and see these goods before you buy, for we surely can please you with the goods and also with the prices.

Very Important.

At the meeting of the stockholders of Evergreen cemetery last Friday evening March 6, the old Directors were reelected for two years. A resolution requesting the directors to bring suit against lot owners for delinquent assessment was adopted. After the adjournment of the stockholders meeting the newly elected directors organized by electing Dr. S. B. Johnston President, Edward Baker Treasurer, and F. E. Davenport Secretary. Assessment No. 5, was levied in the sum of $1.00 on each full lot which must be paid before June 1, '96 to avoid penalty The directors voted to allow 30 days in which to pay delinquent assessments after which time all delinquent claims will be placed in the hands of an attorney for collection. As each lot owner is equally benefited by the work done in the cemetery it is hoped every one will pay promptly, thus avoiding the expense of attorney's fees and costs.

It is not generally understood that the lots may be sold for assessments not paid and all costs and expense taxed against the lot owners. The mailing of statements is an unnecessary expense and it is hoped that each lot owner will pay or remit to F. E. Davenport secretary, without further notice.

They are Here!

We wonder where we will find room for them. Like the street car, "always room for one more;" we are compelled to pile them on top the shelving, under the counter, and it looks like some will have to go on the roof. No use trying to display them all. Can't do it. If you don't see what you want, don't be bashful; ask for it. We think we have the finest line of general merchandise ever shown in Auburn, and we believe that you will agree with us when you've seen our stock. What is

CASTORIA

Castoria is Dr. Samuel Pitcher's prescription for Infants and Children. It contains neither Opium, Morphine nor other Narcotic substance. It is a harmless substitute for Paregoric, Drops, Soothing Syrups, and Castor Oil. It is Pleasant. Its guarantee is thirty years' use by Millions of Mothers. Castoria destroys Worms and allays feverishness. Castoria prevents vomiting Sour Curd, cures Diarrhœa and Wind Colic. Castoria relieves teething troubles, cures constipation and flatulency. Castoria assimilates the food, regulates the stomach and bowels, giving healthy and natural sleep. Castoria is the Children's Panacea—the Mother's Friend.

Castoria.

"Castoria is an excellent medicine for children. Mothers have repeatedly told me of its good effect upon their children."

DR. G. C. OSGOOD, Lowell, Mass.

"Castoria is the best remedy for children of which I am acquainted. I hope the day is not far distant when mothers will consider the real interest of their children, and use Castoria instead of the various quack nostrums which are destroying their loved ones, by forcing opium, morphine, soothing syrup and other hurtful agents down their throats, thereby sending them to premature graves."

DR. J. F. KINCHELOE, Conway, Ark.

Castoria.

"Castoria is so well adapted to children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me."

H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 111 So. Oxford St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

"Our physicians in the children's department have spoken highly of their experience in their outside practice with Castoria, and although we only have among our medical supplies what is known as regular products, yet we are free to confess that the merits of Castoria has won us to look with favor upon it."

EVENTS OF INTEREST

THAT OCCURRED DURING THE PAST WEEK.

Serious Conflicts Between Mobs and Police in the Streets of Milan—Street Car Plunges Into a Bayou—Over $3,000 Thoughtlessly Thrust Into a Stove.

BRISK FIGHTING

Between Soldiers and Mobs on the Streets of Milan.

Rome special: There has been more rioting at Milan. Store windows were shattered with stones and infantry soldiers while trying to disperse the mob stoned. Finally two squadrons of cavalry were ordered to charge the rioters and rode into the mob with drawn swords, pricking the most aggressive of the mob leaders with the points of their weapons or hitting them with the flat of their sabres. The mob replied with showers of stones and shots from revolvers. During the enconnter twelve soldiers and sixteen rioters were wounded.

Train service to and from Milan has been suspended, as the mobs attack all trains attempting to leave or enter that city. The agitation is due to the fierce opposition of the populace to the departure of the troops relieved by the calling out of the reserves of the class of 1872. Crowds are constantly assembled in front of the different barracks of the troops, shouting to the latter, "Do not go to Africa!" &c. One detachment of troops which was on its way to the coast for shipment to Massowah was entrained at a suburb of Milan, that being the only manner in which it was possible to get the men away and avoid the mobs.

A Desperado Kills Himself.

Bellefonte (Pa.) special: William Ettlinger, the backwoods desperado, who has been imprisoned in his house by the sheriff, committed suicide by shooting himself in the head after his house had been set on fire by the sheriff's posse in an attempt to drive him out. His wife and children surrendered and escaped death in the flames. The bodies of the dead constables were then recovered. After the building was enveloped in flames, Ettlinger came to the door and in the presence of the crowd, shot himself, falling back into the ruins. He had killed two constables who were endeavoring to arrest him.

Burned a Fortune.

The wife of Bert McConnell, of Seville, Ohio, took a bundle of bills, notes and securities, amounting to $3,300 with her while she went calling recently. On her return she gathered up some loose paper in the yard, and entering the house, thrust the entire bundle into the stove. The valuables represented the savings of a life time, which McConnell wouldn't trust to the banks.

Court House Burned.

The court house at Wayne, W. Va., was destroyed by fire. The building was erected two years ago at a cost of nearly $80,000. The jail and other buildings situated near were slightly damaged. All the records were saved. The building was partially insured.

Before His Parents' Eyes.

At Noblesville, Ind., Samuel Eader, aged 23, committed suicide in the presence of his aged parents by shooting himself through the head. The act was due to the refusal of his father to give him money with which to go South, where a position awaited him.

'Twill be a Murder.

Cal Pierce, who was shot at Carlton, O., by Ben Hysell, is mortally wounded, and will die. Pierce attacked Hysell without provocation, and Hysell acted in self-defense. Both the men were rivals for the affections of a young woman. Hysell is under arrest.

Casualty at a Funeral.

While the funeral of Miss Mary Jedlica was in progress at 151 West 16th street, Chicago, the sidewalk in front of the house collapsed, causing 100 people to fall ten feet into a basement area. The casket fell on the mother of the dead girl, breaking her foot. All those injured were women except the undertaker. Broken bones were the most serious of their injuries.

Blown to Atoms.

An explosion occurred at the Gove Powder Mills, near Springfield, Ohio, which wrecked one of the buildings. The explosion was caused by the powder in Wheel No. 9, where the powder is ground becoming too dry. The building was blown to atoms, but it is thought no one was hurt. The shock was felt in Springfield.

Political.

Delegates favorable to R. T. McDonald, the electric light magnate, were chosen by the Republicans of Allen County, Ind. This insures his selection as a delegate to the St. Louis convention.

Masonic Temple Theater, Ft. Wayne, Indiana.

March 16.—"Sowing the Wind."
March 17.—"Plays and Players."
March 24.—"For Fair Virginia."

Street Car's Awful Plunge.

A street car of the Real and Magnolia line, Memphis, Tenn., jumped the track and tumbled into the bayou, fifteen feet below. Mrs. Caroline Heinriche and George Bennett, motorman, will probably die. Several others were injured.

Paid With His Life.

William Cluster, a farmer, was killed in the saw mill of Bagwell & Tolding, near Kokomo, Ind. A flying timber struck him on the head. Cluster began work there only that day to pay a small debt he owed the mill men.

Apartment House Burned.

The Genesee apartment house burned at Utica, N. Y. The seven stories contained 68 families or about 250 inmates. It is certain that four lives were lost. The building is in a fashionable neighborhood and the occupants are in good circumstances. The loss of household effects is heavy. The building is worth $80,000.

Mine Horror.

Berlin special: An explosion, followed by fire occurred in the Cleophas mine at Kattowitz, the other day. The bodies of twenty-one victims have been taken out of the pit, but about 100 men are still entombed in the mine, whose fate is uncertain.

AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

The Merchants of the Island Aroused Against the United States.

A special from Havana says: All the merchants of Cienfuegos have agreed to cancel the orders given to their correspondents in the United States, as a protest against the action of the American Congress on the Cuban question. The merchants talked of holding a demonstration but Captain General Weyler prohibited it. The chamber of commerce here met to consider the question of taking similar action. Gen. Weyler advised the chamber to be prudent.

There is talk of stopping the exportation of tobacco in bales and to permit the export of only the manufactured product.

General Weyler has placed restrictions on the sale of petroleum and has prohibited its sale in the interior towns which the insurgents visit.

The following towns in the province of Pinar Del Rio have been recently burned by the rebels: Cabanas, Bahia, Honda, San Diego De Nunez Santa Cruz De Los Banes, San Jany Martinez, and Quiebra Hacha.

The gunboat Linee, which was carrying rations to Jibro, on the south coast of Camaguay, found chains across the entrance of the harbor. The vessel was fired upon by rebels and replied with her guns.

The volunteers at Gibracoa surrendered the fort there to the rebels. The insurgents took all their arms and then released the men.

FEARFUL EXPLOSION.

Parks Brothers' Establishment at Danbury, Conn., Laid Waste.

By a boiler explosion in Parks Brothers' fur cutting establishment at Danbury, Conn., a fire was caused, which did damage amounting to fully $200,000, and resulted in probably fatal injuries to two men. The explosion tore the roof from the building, a small wooden affair of two stories. Edward Parks, one of the proprietors, was thrown down by the explosion and frightfully burned. He may die. The building was consumed, together with a sash and blind factory adjoining it. The flames communicated also with the Barnum building, the Sherman block, and other property, which was consumed. Sadie Carpenter, a tenant of an upper floor, jumped from a window and broke her thigh. Frank Eastwood, a fireman, was buried beneath a falling wall and fatally injured. There are rumors that two children are missing, but the report cannot be verified.

Knights of Pythias.

Supreme Chancellor Richie, of the Knights of Pythias, has issued a proclamation that the Supreme Lodge will meet in Cleveland, August 25, and saying that if satisfactory arrangements can be made locally and with the railroads, the encampment of the military branch of the order may be held there. The centennial of Cleveland is to be commemorated in August, and if possible arrangements will be made to secure the camp vacated by the Ohio National Guard for the Knights of Pythias.

Burned in Her Home.

Fire was discovered in a small house occupied by Mrs. Patterson, an aged widow situated near Claysville, five miles southeast of New Concord, Ohio, by a passing farmer, who broke open the door and extinguished the fire, and was horrified by finding Mrs. Patterson lying on the floor, burned to a crisp. Deceased was 80 years old, and highly respected.

A $250,000 Fire.

The business portion of the town of McKinney, Texas, was visited by a disastrous conflagration, which did damage amounting to about $250,000. The Jesse Shain block, occupied by the Kentucky store, Lewis & Dittos' grocery, Sargent's book store, and several smaller concerns, were destroyed.

H. H. Holmes Must Hang.

The Pennsylvania State Supreme Court has affirmed the verdict of murder in the first degree in the case of Herman W. Mudget, alias H. H. Holmes, found guilty in the court of moyer and terminer of Philadelphia, of the murder of Benjamin Pietzel.

Houses Badly Shaken.

Throughout Eastern Berke County, Penn., for a distance of ten miles, a distinct shock of earthquake was felt the other night. Houses were shaken, windows rattled, and some places glass was broken. The residents were greatly alarmed.

Murder at New Albany.

As the result of a drunken quarrel, Joseph Linthicum, a colored porter, was stabbed by his wife, Sadie, at New Albany, Ind., and died in thirty minutes. Mrs. Linthicum was arrested.

Killed in a Runaway.

At Millersburg, Ohio, John Fleming, Postmaster at Grade, fell out of his wagon in a runaway, and literally mashed his face, dying in a few minutes. He was 55 years old and married.

Will Not Surrender His Province.

VETERANS WILL REST

HAVE A PLEASANT HOME ON THE WABASH.

Indiana's State Buildings for Old Soldiers Are Situated Amid Historic Surroundings—The Home Is Hampered by Small Appropriations.

For Old Boys in Blue.

Little has been said and less has been written regarding the Indiana State Soldiers' Home. A location which possesses more of natural beauty or historic interest would be difficult to find. The home, which was officially opened about a month ago, lies upon the west bluffs of the Wabash river. From more than one point may be obtained a fine view of Lafayette, upon the opposite side of the river some three and a half miles distant.

The grounds comprise 237 acres, and have a water frontage of over 2,000 feet.

JOHN P. MEGREW.
(Commander of the Indiana State Soldiers' Home at Lafayette, Ind.)

The bluff rises abruptly from the river to a height of about seventy-five feet, covered with a dense growth of heavy forest trees. From there it slopes gradually back to the upper plateau, about 200 feet above the river level. The road which leads to this charming site lies along the west bank of the Wabash. On the waters of this stream once floated the canoes of Jesuit emissaries like La Salle and his indomitable assistant, Lieut. Jonty. From Fort Miami, on the lakes, to St. Louis, on the Mississippi, they came and went, often visiting the Wabash tribe and urging them to join the powerful Algonquin confederacy and thus cripple the warlike Iroquois.

OLD PEOPLE'S HOME—INDIANA STATE SOLDIERS' HOME.

The past goes with you at every step as you stroll about the site dedicated to the defenders of the Union. Turn to the northeast and, at the mouth of the Tippecanoe, you will see where the great village of Keth-tip-ke-ca-nunk stood, proud of its shingle-roofed houses, seventy of which were destroyed by fire when the village was captured by Capt. Wilkinson in 1791. This village marked an advance in civilization more than commensurate with the times, and which can only be accounted for by the presence of many French traders.

Turn to the southward, and from the commanding height there stretches before you for miles the great Wea Plains, which were once the home of that most powerful tribe, the Miamis. At the close of the eighteenth century this plain contained five large Indian villages, the most powerful of which was Ouiatenon, which, with the others, after nearly a century of remarkable history, was destroyed by Gen. Scott. Across from the plains, on the opposite side of the river, it is stated, stood Fort Ouiatenon, which was built away back in 1720 and was captured by the Indians some forty-three years after, during the Pontiac conspiracy.

Commands Historic Spots.

From this same height, where now the gray-haired veterans whose service to their country is being in slight manner rewarded, you may look out toward historic spots. The site of the Winnebago village upon the Wild Cat may be seen, and, while the exact spots have not been located, fancy may easily picture the Kickapoo villages, which are known to have existed above and below, along the banks of the Wabash.

INDIANA OLD SOLDIERS' HOME.

The roadway from Lafayette to the new soldiers' home follows the course of the river, and on either side is heavily timbered. The hills rise precipitately on the west, the river flows placidly on the east and is skirted by giant elms and sycamores, some of which looked down upon and shielded the early aborigines.

Nearing the grounds of the soldiers' home, the road gradually rises above the river level. There lies upon the right a peculiar park, known as Tecumseh's Trail. It is private property, and its name is derived from the fact that upon this exact spot Tecumtha, the greatest of the Shawanoe chiefs and perhaps the most eminent warrior and statesman of the Algonquin race, camped when on the way to engage in the famous battle of Tippecanoe.

It was but a few miles to the north of the site selected for the soldiers' home that our forefathers on that memorable dark and rainy morning in November, in 1811, shattered forever the strongest confederacy known among the Indians of that time.

Buildings of the Home.

From the camp ground of Tecumtha the road makes an abrupt and precipitous ascent to the plateau above, where stand the newly erected buildings of the soldiers' home. They are not many, nor are they elaborate in finish or construction. The State Legislature voted an appropriation of $75,000 for an institution deserving a multiplication of figures. That amount was spent upon buildings alone. The trustees, fortunately, have had sufficient faith in future legislative action, and have gone into their own pockets to an amount approximating $8,000, in furnishing the buildings, for which the entire appropriation had been expended in construction.

The soldiers' home was officially opened Feb. 1, but the first inmate arrived on the scene Jan. 2. At the present time there are 104 persons at the home, all but two of whom are members. The formal opening has been postponed until July 4, at which time Gov. Matthews and many distinguished guests will be present.

Col. John P. Megrew, commandant, has been an especially busy man since the home opened. He was a captain of the Eleventh Indiana volunteers, and, although enlisting in the thirty-day service, he served to the end of the war under Gen. Lew Wallace. Prior to holding the present position Col. Megrew was commandant of the soldiers' home at Warm Springs, S. D. The officers, besides the commandant, are: Capt. W. F. Havens, adjutant and quartermaster; Laura E. Ingersoll, matron; Dr. W. P. Younkey, surgeon, and Dr. J. C. Sargent, assistant surgeon.

"Illinois has one of the most economical of soldiers' homes," said Commander Megrew. "Iowa and Nebraska may also be classed as moderate in their expenditures. We have to look to New England for lavish expenditure of money in caring for the veterans of the civil war. This home is absolutely new, and it is impossible to tell what the future will hold for it. This year we will be forced to run at an expense of $146 per capita. That includes, not alone inmates, but officers' salaries and all running expenses. It is the minimum figure for any soldiers' home in the country.

"I have no doubt that within two years this home will have over 500 inmates, and that it will ultimately hold over 1,000."

The citizens of Lafayette take a just pride in this State institution, which, from its remarkably fine location, is liable to become one of the foremost of its kind. In addition to the seven substantial brick buildings which have been erected with the $75,000 appropriated, there are eleven frame cottages completed and ready for occupancy. The cottage system is in vogue, and appears to be popular in the extreme. The policy of the Legislature was to establish general buildings, and to ask the counties, as far as possible, to erect cottages for the use of inmates from the respective counties. The act of establishment empowers county commissioners to make donations for this purpose. Every county, it is claimed, is now supporting, through its township trustees, a number of indigent veterans, whose pensions are not sufficient to support them, at a much greater expense than would be necessary were they maintained at a State institution, where the general Government contributes more than two-thirds of the expense.

Uses and Dimensions.

The general buildings which have been erected are: The Old People's Home, Old Men's Home, quartermaster's department, dining hall and widows' home, hospital, commissary department, power house and water works.

The Old People's Home has a north front of 108 feet and an east front of 112 feet. It contains forty-five rooms and from the tower, 148 feet high, may be seen in the city of Lafayette, Delphi, Tippecanoe battlefield, the Wea plains and the Wabash rivers for many miles. It is intended to accommodate old soldiers and their wives.

The dining hall has a south front of 112 feet and an east front of 92 feet. The entire first floor is occupied by the general dining room, general kitchen, bakery, storeroom, general serving room and steward's office. The dining room contains ample space for 250 table seats and has a kitchen capacity to accommodate 500 people.

George Palmer, of Rushville, narrowly escaped lynching Tuesday. His escape from town only saved him. Palmer's offense is the inhuman treatment of his twin daughters, Lizzie and Rachel, aged 18. The girls were driven from home and secured employment as domestics in the Main Street House. The father gave orders to the proprietor of the hotel to pay his daughters no money and collected their wages and spent it in dissipation. One of the girls had her feet frozen for want of shoes, which the father refused to buy. When she asked for money to treat her frost-bitten feet he whipped her, she says. The other daughter claimed her father had kicked and bruised her and knocked her senseless. Both girls said their lives had frequently been threatened, and Lizzie in despair attempted to commit suicide by taking poison. The daughters filed suit against their father for assault and battery, but had to invoke police protection in going to the prosecutor's office. Palmer attempted to enter the hotel to kill his daughters with a gun he carried. That evening a mob formed and set out in search of him. Palmer fled to the country, but was later arrested. He pleaded guilty to acts of revolting cruelty and was fined to the full extent of the law. He also pleaded guilty to carrying concealed weapons with the intention of killing his daughters. In default of bond he was placed in jail.

SPANIARDS STONE ANOTHER AMERICAN CONSULATE.

United States Consulate in Valencia Attacked by a Furious Mob and Windows Smashed—Princeton Students Burn the King in Effigy.

Mob's Work at Valencia.

Spanish hatred of the United States continues to break forth afresh. Renewed demonstrations were made Thursday and a mob stoned the United States consulate at Valencia, in spite of the precautions of the authorities and the alertness of the police. When the mob formed, its objective point was the consulate and extra preparations were made to guard against an attack. But almost before the police were aware of it a flank movement had been executed and the howling, yelling horde had gathered in the street. Stones were thrown which smashed the windows of the consulate. The police made a strong charge and dispersed the crowd. The university has been closed under orders from the Government, as it was feared the meetings of the students would be a hotbed for breeding disorders.

Repeated attempts were made by disorderly paraders to make their way to the United States consulate, but they were as often frustrated, as the authorities had received special orders to be on the lookout for any demonstration against the property of the United States. Special protection was afforded the building in which the office of the consul is located, with a view to the same end. The mob, however, gathered in front of the building before the police were aware of what was going on, and stones began to fly from the crowd, with the result that many windows were broken. The crowd was cheered on by sympathizers in the streets and from the neighboring houses. The police lost no time in charging the rioters and the mob was speedily dispersed, although missiles were flung as those who threw them were taking flight.

ITALY'S DAY OF WOE.

Whole Country Is Aroused by the Overwhelming Defeat in Abyssinia.

The news of terrible defeat to its army in Abyssinia has set all Italy wild with excitement. Premier Crispi has tendered his resignation, which has been accepted by the king, and it is announced that the Chamber of Deputies will be asked to impeach Crispi and the other members of his cabinet for gross mismanagement of the Abyssinian campaign. Indignation meetings have been held and riotous demonstrations made in most of the cities, and from the rural districts loud cries are sent up for vengeance upon those who have been responsible for this almost annihilating defeat. Indignation against the Government is increased by the calling out of 80,000 men of the reserves of 1872 for active service. As the great majority of these men are married and have families depending upon them for support, their preparations to obey orders in Milan and other places were the signal for rioting, the agitation being led by the women and children, and in some instances the men were prevented from leaving the towns. The mobs stoned and otherwise beat the police into helplessness and even attacked the soldiers, numerous persons throwing themselves in mad frenzy upon the naked steel in the hands of the troops.

These demonstrations might have been expected from the excitable Italian people when the sad truth burst upon them that through bad management at home and poor generalship at Adowa the army in Abyssinia had been entrapped to its destruction, with a loss of five to ten thousand in killed and wounded and of all the ammunition and food stores, leaving the survivors in a hopeless plight. Their situation is such that they cannot hope to be able to hold their ground till the arrival of sufficient reinforcements, even if they should be sent. The report that Gen. Baratieri had committed suicide turns out to be incorrect; but it would seem as if that would have been the best thing he could do under the circumstances, for, if the darker and darker reports which are reaching Rome from Massowah are substantiated, he will have great difficulty in escaping a capital sentence on his trial by court-martial. It is said, among other things, that he deserted his troops while the latter were fighting gallantly against overwhelming numbers of Shoans, and fled.

SPAIN'S NAVY.

Uncle Sam Has No Need to Fear Anything from It.

The action of Congress on the Cuban resolution, makes it of interest to know just how strong a navy the peninsular power has at her disposal. Spain's navy contains one old battleship, launched in 1887, or nearly nine years ago, before Harveyized armor had revolutionized the art of protecting men of war. This is the Pelayo. She has a displacement of 9,900 tons, a speed of 15½ knots an hour and carries two 12½-inch guns, two 11-inch guns and 19 smaller pieces.

Spain also has ten first-class, six second-class and forty-nine third-class cruisers. In torpedo boats she has forty. On the whole our navy has absolutely nothing to fear from that of Spain, for here is what we have to set against it: We have no less than six first-class vessels, each of them better than the Pelayo, each with a greater horse power and speed equal to hers. Each of them, too, is better armed. We have seven first-class, thirteen second-class and twenty-one third-class cruisers. We have, however, but three torpedo boats, but the efficiency of this class of vessels has never yet been shown.

MANY TOWNS LAID WASTE.

Scenes of Desolation in Cuba—Reports of Recent Battles.

The reopening of telegraphic communication with the region of Pinar del Rio, Cuba, brings the first detailed information of affairs in that province for several weeks. The rich Vuelta Abajo tobacco district seems to have been put to the torch, and is apparently reduced to a desolate wilderness. Whole towns have been obliterated and reduced to a heap of ashes, and their inhabitants are wandering helpless over the face of the country, many of them starving. The villages and towns of Cabanas, Bahia Honda, San Diego de Nunez, Santa Cruz de los Pinos, Los Palacios, Piso Real de San Diego and San Diego de los Banos are known to be reduced to ashes. All of these were important and thriving centers of population and business. The last town which has succumbed to the insurgents' torch is San Juan y Martinez. The tobacco from this town is famous the world over. Its cultivation brought great wealth to the people of the district and gave material for a large commerce in the town and support to over 1,000 families.

Carillo and Rojas, the insurgent leaders, at the head of about 700 of their followers, recently attacked a company of the Sicilia battalion and the local guerilla force of San Andres, near Holguin, province of Santiago de Cuba. The soldiers were protected by a convoy of provisions and supplies, made a brilliant defense and repulsed the insurgents with a loss of twenty-five killed. The enemy retired with many wounded. The troops lost one lieutenant killed and seven guerrillas wounded.

Salvador, Rioss, Fonseca, Romualdo, Aguillero and Chango, insurgent leaders, at the head of about 600 men, recently attacked a lieutenant and seventy guerrillas, who were out foraging. The insurgents fired from the cane fields and obliged the troops to retreat with the loss of a lieutenant and four men killed and seven privates wounded. Aguillero was killed and six insurgents were wounded.

SPAIN'S PRIME MINISTER.

Man Who Apologized for the Hostile Acts of the Barcelona Mob.

Senor Antonio Canovas del Castillo, the prime minister of Spain, who apologized to United States Minister Taylor for the hostile demonstration of the mob at Barcelona, is one of the most eminent literary men of Europe besides being a really good statesman. Since he formed his ministry a year ago last June he has earned praise from the Spanish people. It was Canovas who ordered Concas, the geographer, to apologize to Minister Taylor recently for having spoken abusively of the United States, and it was by his orders that special detachments of police were put into service on Sunday to prevent any serious attack on the legation of the United States. All this was thoughtful and wise. And now comes Senor Canovas to apologize for the attack on the consulate at Barcelona. The premier was born in 1830, and his public life began in 1851, when he became editor of the Patria. Three years later he was named deputy for Malaga, and has been in the cortes ever since that time. He has had some diplomatic experience. In 1856 he was charge d'affaires at Rome. He it was who was largely concerned in drawing up the concordat between Spain and the holy sea. He has been in turn Governer of Cadiz, director general of the administration and under secretary of state for the interior. In 1864 the queen called him to the ministry, and he was minister of finance and of the colonies. Passing through the revolution, his greatest triumph was to uphold legitimate and constitutional monarchy in the constituent assembly of 1868 in the face of the triumphant revolution. For this he has become the supreme director of the Alfonsist party, and his honors in that capacity have been sufficient to make up a small history in themselves.

SENOR ANTONIO CANOVAS DEL CASTILLO.

SPAIN'S KING HANGED.

Princetonians Swing Him in Effigy and Rip Up His Flag.

Students of Princeton College hanged Alfonso, the King of Spain, in effigy, and, after dragging the gorgeous banner of the dons through the streets, tore it to pieces. This was the answer of the lusty American boys to the acts of violence against the United States on the part of the students at Barcelona, Valencia and Madrid.

At Leadville, Colo., there was most intense excitement when the news was received of the burning of the American flag by the Spaniards. A flag of Spain was discovered in the stock of a dry goods merchant, and the crowd quickly found kindling wood. The wood was ignited, and while the crowd sang "America" and "Columbia" the flag of Spain was burned to ashes.

THE MAN OF THE HOUR

Menelik II., Emperor of Shoa and Abyssinia, King of Kings in all Africa and monarch of Ethiopia, is the man who is causing all the trouble to Italy by not allowing that country to "protect" him. Menelik has an idea that he is thoroughly capable of protecting himself and proposes to do it on his own ground rather than trade off all his real estate for "protection" of the European kind. This great ruler is, perhaps, the most interesting monarch in all the world. He claims to be a line descendant of the famous Queen of Sheba, and that his realms are the famous Ophir of the Scriptures. Whatever value may be in that claim, it is true that Menelik has the old-time idea of how to be a king. He has been able to teach a great European power a lesson which it will never forget. He has caused all the big ministers of state and potentates in Europe to open their eyes very wide and to realize that in him they have a real king to play with. Menelik is certainly a surprise to the King of Italy, and it is said that he will be the most important man in the game of chess which the European powers are ever playing. He was born in 1848 in his father's kingdom of Shoa. His mother was a beggar whom the king took a fancy to and married. He ruled in Shoa after having spent his youth in all sorts of wild adventures, and when King John of Abyssinia died in 1889 Menelik marched to Abyssinia, had himself crowned Emperor of Abyssinia and Shoa and proclaimed himself King of Kings. He was enabled to do this with Italian interference, but he later flung aside this alliance because, as he said, Italy desired to absorb his kingdom. The country he rules is very rich in gold, luxuriant in vegetation and in every way a desirable place. Its population is 3,000,000.

MRS. LELAND STANFORD.

Woman Who Won a Great Case After Years of Litigation.

The Supreme Court decision in the Stanford University case was a splendid victory for education, and the noble lady, who has practically sacrificed her life and given away a queenly fortune for the higher good of humanity, is well worthy of the congratulations which, no doubt, will be showered upon her from all parts of the country. The case was a singular one. Had it been decided against her she would have lost more than $15,000,000, and the very life props of the splendid university at Palo Alto would have been swept away and the money turned over to the United States Government.

The case was started in California to force the Stanford estate, represented by Stanford's widow, to pay to the United States some $15,000,000 as the share of Stanford of the debt due the United States by the Central Pacific Railway, on the principle of stockholders' liability. Mrs. Stanford won in the lower courts and now the Supreme Court has affirmed their decisions, which are briefly that the stockholders of the Central Pacific are not individually liable for their shares of the debt.

He had seen her pass swiftly in the direction from which he had just then come, and presently heard her voice calling to the garden coolies, and interrogating them in turn. Then she came and stood on the threshold of the open door.

"Oh, Nora, have you seen my ring?" she asked piteously, in her excitement, only giving the curtest possible nod to Colonel Prinsep.

"No, dear. Have you lost it? Where did you have it last?"

"I took it off while I was transplanting those cuttings, and laid it down beside me. Then when I went back for it, it was gone"—with a distressed accent, and a tragic movement of her hands so expressive of loss that Mrs. Dene felt half inclined to smile. Not so Colonel Prinsep, who looked such a picture of guilt that if Jane had not been too preoccupied to notice, she must have found him out.

"It may have rolled away," he suggested, awkwardly. "Let me go and help you."

"Oh, no, thank you! I can find it best myself," answered Jane quickly, and ran off.

But, in spite of her prohibition, he followed. When he came up she was standing staring blankly at the rifled ring which she held in the palm of her outstretched hand.

"Ah, you have found it!" he remarked, with an overdone air of cheerfulness.

"Found it?" she repeated, tearfully. "Oh, yes, I have found it! But—but——" Then with a sudden gleam of hope: "Perhaps it has fallen into the water. There is a piece still missing—it might have rolled into the water, might it not?" she asked, eagerly.

"Certainly it might, if—if it was a round piece."

"It was round."

She looked at the water wistfully, but did not attempt to search for it. He understood why.

"You prize the ring very much?" he questioned, searchingly.

The eloquence of her eyes told him how much rather than her words, which were commonplace enough.

"It was a present, perhaps?" he went on, inquiringly.

"No, no, I bought it myself. Of course I know it was only silver, but——"

She stopped abruptly, no longer able to conceal her impatience to be alone.

"Will you go in and tell Mrs. Dene that I am coming?" she asked, imploringly.

He turned and went at once, but as he entered the drawing-room he could not help seeing her as she knelt upon the ground, and with her own hands dug among the mud in her vain endeavor to recover what she had lost. He almost repented then of what he had done, and he felt still more penitent when a little later Jane came in, looking so desolate and despairing that Mrs. Dene involuntarily exclaimed:

"Why, child, whatever is the matter? I understood from the Colonel that you had found your ring."

"Not all of it—a piece is missing."

"It can be replaced"—with a little gentle surprise at the other's exaggerated grief.

"It can never be replaced."

"Then it must be found. I will offer a reward for it, and that will make the servants more eager in their search. You must describe what it is like."

"I can't do that."

"Then, my dear, how can we help you?"

"Not at all; I must look for it myself. Don't be offended, Nora—I am very grateful to you all the same."

She had blushed so vividly that Mrs. Dene hastened to change a subject evidently embarrassing.

"Colonel Prinsep came to ask us if we would go to the sports this afternoon. Should you care about it, Jenny?"

"I will go, of course, if you wish it."

"But do you care about it?"

"I hate sports," declared Jane, viciously, mindful of the gymkhana at which she had first met and lost her heart to Stephen Prinsep.

"Then, my dear, don't go. Life is too short to be bored," smiled Mrs. Dene. "But you must not stay in always with me; you ought to go out. Would you like to ride Selim?"

"Oh, Nora, may I? I have not ridden him since we were at Simla!" cried Jane, excitedly, almost forgetting her trouble.

"I did not know you were so fond of riding," said Colonel Prinsep.

"And you don't know Selim. He is not like any other horse that ever was. I can trust him."

"All the same, I shall not let you go alone. You are bound to go to the gymkhana, I suppose, Colonel Prinsep?"

"No. If Miss Knox will allow me to accompany her I shall be delighted."

And, for some reason or other, perhaps to prove how utter was her indifference, Miss Knox made no objection.

They started early in the afternoon, Jane looking shyly bewitching in her neatly fitting habit and broad Terai hat, Colonel Prinsep sitting erect in his saddle, scarcely glancing in his companion's direction, as he discoursed upon every subject likely to interest her, yet avoided with intention anything personal. Jane felt as though she must be in a dream—listening to his voice, the same, yet so changed to her. Knowing nothing of the memories that were surging through his brain, rendering him often unconscious of what he had said, and oblivious of her replies, she thought that it was only another sign that he had ceased to care for her, and made an effort to appear unconcerned as he.

A boy ran out of a native hut shouting wildly and firing off several fire-works in succession. The sensitive Arab which Jenny rode first reared and plunged wildly, then started off at a furious gallop. Colonel Prinsep followed as quickly as he dared, fearing to frighten the animal more if he went too near. At present there was a chance of his settling down into a quiet canter when his excitement had subsided. But Selim, who so seldom broke out thus, determined to have a final fling. Putting his head between his legs he gave two or three violent buck-jumps that succeeded in dislodging Jane; and then, as she slipped down, her arms tightly clasping his neck, he stood as meekly as the lamb he had always been considered before.

When her escort came up, he found her flushed and trembling, still holding the reins, her hair falling about her in magnificent masses, and glinting in the sun like autumn leaves, a hundred subtle shades of brown and gold.

He placed his hand upon Selim's shining neck.

"The horse you trusted," he remarked, with what he tried to make a cynical smile, yet felt convinced was only foolishly tender.

"I shall never trust anything again," declared Jane, with decision.

"Ah, you must not say that! Selim was only rash, not vicious. It would not be fair to condemn any one for a single fault."

She gave a swift glance into his face, wondering if he were pleading for himself or only Selim. To avoid her scrutiny he turned and took his horse from the native who was holding it. Then mounting, he rode along quietly by her side.

The winter sun that shone coldly seemed to have reserved a special radiance for the girl's bright locks as they waved softly behind her; there was, too, a gleam in her hazel eyes that had not been there before. Everything looked bright and beautiful that afternoon, thought Stephen Prinsep, but nothing so bright, so beautiful as his whilom sweetheart.

After a time their relations grew less strained, yet also less full of tremulous delight. They were talking as ordinary acquaintances might have talked, when at last they reached the bungalow gates.

Then Colonel Prinsep said, earnestly, and without connection to what they had been saying before:

"Jenny, will you do what I am going to ask? Will you ask Mrs. Knox to tell you the whole story about Jacob Lynn's letters?"

A little nervously she promised; and then put her hand in his to say "good-by." He relinquished it even sooner than courtesy might have dictated, but stood looking at her with gentle gravity. An almost leafless tree with graceful golden pods waved above her; behind a group of banana trees—two large, milk-eyed bullocks were working a well, and the droning whir-r-r of the wheel was the only sound that broke the stillness. A woman with her face almost hidden by a silk-embroidered scarf stood watching them from a little distance. The scene was intensely Indian, yet Stephen Prinsep found his thoughts insensibly reverting to his English home, with its trim flower-beds and well-kept walks. In fancy he could almost imagine that even now he was walking under the avenue of chestnuts with his bride, pointing out to her each familiar spot they passed.

"You won't come in?" asked Jane, timidly.

"No, I won't come in, thank you. Good-by."

CHAPTER XLII.

When Jane went in she found a note from her mother containing rather startling news. The quartermaster had been so unwell that Mrs. Knox had called in a doctor, who pronounced it to be an utter breaking-up of health, consequent on his long residence in the country, and that the only remedy he could suggest was a year's leave to England.

"This, of course," wrote Mrs. Knox, "will be a serious pecuniary loss; but we must grudge nothing that will restore to us your father as he used to be."

"Ah, that he can never be again!" sighed Jane, as she put down the letter. She scarcely knew whether to be glad or sorry at the decision thus announced; whether it would be a relief to go or great grief. "How could she," she asked herself, "leave India, not knowing whether she might ever see her lover's face again?"

She thought of going home at once, much as she dreaded the meeting with her father; then glancing again at the letter she saw that Mrs. Knox expressly desired she would not shorten her visit, which in any case would be at an end in a few days.

Those last days, how Jane enjoyed them!

Stephen Prinsep, who came every day, scarcely recognized her in this new mood. Was it frivolity or heartlessness, or the excitement engendered by despair? May be the last conjecture was nearer the truth than she herself knew.

They never saw each other alone, so it was the easier for the Colonel to keep to his resolution. He did not startle her again. An outsider would have thought them merely friends. Jane herself was often reminded of the time when her engagement to Jacob Lynn was a secret still, and all unconsciously she was learning to love one whom it had seemed fated she should never marry.

One day Mrs. Dene asked her to remain with her during the year her parents would be away; but she put the temptation from her bravely.

"You are as good as you have always been," she answered, gratefully; "but it is my duty to go with them to help my mother."

"Certainly the great reformer must have been your ancestor," commented the Colonel, when he heard of the offer and its refusal.

"Indeed, I don't think even John Knox took so much delight in denying himself," complained Mrs. Dene.

"I expect John Knox was good all round," observed Jane, quaintly, "and did not need to distinguish himself in any particular direction. Besides," she added, gravely, after a pause, "it is my pleasure, of course, as well as my duty, to go with my father and mother."

She was sitting a little distance off, and Colonel Prinsep crossed the room and stood near her looking down.

"Would nothing induce you to stay behind?" he asked, in a voice so low that Mrs. Dene could not have heard it, even if she had not at that moment been busy counting a cross-stitch pattern.

She shook her head, not daring to trust herself to speak.

"You might marry," he hazarded.

"Never, never!"

"Why?" he asked her boldly, his eyes still fastened on her face.

Her lips quivered in such evident distress that he could not press the question.

"All girls say that," he remarked instead, with a touch of incredibility.

"Not, I hope, with such good reason," she replied, with a dignity so full of sorrow that he was silenced.

Even with the hope of consoling her at last, he had no right to pain her so. This was the last day.

Mrs. Dene's stay at Alipore had done her undoubted good. She was looking better and brighter than she had looked for a long time, since her husband's death, in fact. People thought that she was already comforted for his loss, and began to wonder if she would marry again, and if so, whom. Some such speculation was expressed in the hearing of Barry Larron, and the thought entered into his mind that, perhaps, it might be for his advantage if she married him. Feeling terribly sore after his rejection by the quartermaster's daughter, and unable to carry out his revengeful threat with any hope of success, he fancied he might hurt her by so suddenly transferring his attentions that she would be fain to doubt whether they had ever seriously been offered to herself. To do this he must manage an exchange to Hattiabad, where the detachment was, and where he would have every opportunity of maturing his plans. This for two reasons—first, because even he would lack the assurance necessary to make love to one woman under the very eyes of that other he had so lately wooed—and secondly, because Mrs. Dene herself was going so soon.

But he was too cautious to take this decisive move until he had satisfied himself that he would receive a warm welcome. Not that he doubted it, only it was his nature to calculate, as well as to scheme.

So it happened that, when Jane and Mrs. Dene arrived at the station, the first person they saw walking down the platform was Major Larron.

Jane drew back at once.

"I will go and get your ticket, and see after your luggage. Perhaps he will have gone by then," she suggested, nervously. Mrs. Dene assented, and walked on alone.

Major Larron advanced to meet her, in irreproachable morning costume, with a rosebud in button-hole. The widow, he thought, might be more critical than the girl.

"I heard you were going to-day, and did not wish you to leave without saying good-by," he began. "I don't think, however, it will be long before we meet again."

"No?" queried Mrs. Dene, so quietly that, had he not been certain she must care for him still, now there was no barrier between them, he might have read indifference in her tone.

He was thinking to himself that report had spoken truly; she was looking very well, nearly as pretty as when she was a girl, and far more interesting.

"I am coming to Hattiabad; to stay for some time, I fancy."

She looked up languidly, surprised.

"You will find it very dull, I am afraid."

"I do not think so. I always like Hattiabad. Do you remember when we met there first."

"I remember distinctly everything connected with our acquaintance, Major Larron."

She was looking into his face still, with such utter coldness and dislike, as she guessed at his intentions, that he was almost convinced of his mistake. But he would not admit it yet.

"I am afraid you have not forgiven me," he said, reproachfully.

Her eyes were all ablaze as she answered scornfully:

"Forgiven you? Why, I am grateful to you, more grateful than I can express, for saving me from a marriage that would have made me wretched, and giving me instead the noblest, kindest husband that ever woman had. Thanks to you I have known what perfect happiness is, and though I possessed it for so short a time, it is enough to sweeten the remainder of a life that would otherwise be sad enough, heaven knows."

The Hon. Barry Larron twirled his dark mustache, and tried to look unmoved.

"I don't think you have ever understood me, quite," he said, a little awkwardly.

Mrs. Dene shrugged her shoulders, not attempting to conceal her contempt. Though she had said as much herself to Jane, she began to doubt it now. A man who had acted with so little sincerity and delicacy of feeling might be capable of anything, she thought.

"Well, I must not keep you longer now," observed Larron. "We shall soon meet at Hattiabad."

But in his own mind that scheme was already abandoned.

TURKEY'S STRONG ARMY.

The Moslems Have Been Thoroughly Drilled in Modern Warfare.

An interview recently had with Gen. von der Galtz Pasha, the German reorganizer of the Turkish army, just retired, foreshadows, on the part of the Mussulman, a very different sort of resistance to attack by a Christian power than he has been thought capable of. The general says Turkey has to-day a thoroughly modern army, commanded by officers well skilled in the art of war.

"Ever since the last war," says the general, "the Sultan has done everything in his power to put his army on the most modern footing. The world knows only of Moslem defeats in our days. Turkish officers and generals have had a bad name, not because they lacked in aggressiveness or courage, but because they had little else to recommend them. This state of things, reminding one of mediaeval times, has totally changed. Ever since 1886 large detachments of Turks have, after receiving preliminary instruction at home, taken service in the German army, to return after a year or so of hard work and disseminate the knowledge thus gained among their comrades. In the same way, but merely for instructive purposes, have exemplary German officers taken position with the Sultan's troops.

"It happens frequently that foreign officers entering the service of a friendly nation do so on account of the difficulties at home. They seek a change of air to escape creditors, or on account of differences with their superiors. The Sultan very properly declined to receive men so situated as instructors. His friendship with the Kaiser guaranteed the character of all the officers engaged for his army; they were all picked soldiers, tried teachers, men of stamina and experience. The book of instructions newly introduced into the Turkish army is similar to the German military code.

"The Turkish officers' corps is now a very progressive and respectable body of men. While in the Sultan's service I delivered two or three lectures every week before army officers, followed by a lengthy discussion. I was astonished at the character of the speeches, questions and demonstrations I heard. They proved above all that these much maligned men are of studious habits and take their profession very much in earnest. Fatalists, as most of them are, they know that safety lies in knowledge. As to the Moslem military spirit, it is as strong to-day as ever during the last two centuries. The Turk is a most enduring creature, hardy and capable of withstanding great bodily inflictions. His courage has never been doubted. Such a soldier needs only capable officers to be almost invincible, and the Sultan's army is now splendidly officered and good material is added daily.

"The mobilization of the Turkish army, if such becomes necessary, will be effected within one week; the Macedonia contingent will be in marching order within five days."

The disesteem and contempt of others is inseparable from pride. It is hardly possible to overvalue ourselves but by undervaluing our neighbors.

FESTIVE SEASONS FOR DWELLERS IN LUMBER CAMPS.

Married Amid Pines.

The formerly vast and seemingly inexhaustible forests of the United States are threatened with utter and swift destruction. Such is the warning of the Government Forestry Bureau and figures are furnished to substantiate this grave opinion. The total forest area in the United States is estimated at 495,000,000 acres, or 26 per cent. of the total area. Alaska and Indian reservations are not included in these figures.

The present annual requirements for consumption of forest products in the United States are approximately over 24,000,000,000 cubic feet, made up of the following items: Lumber market and manufacturers, 5,000,000,000 cubic feet; railroad construction, 600,000,000 cubic feet; charcoal, 250,000,000 cubic feet; fences, 500,000,000 cubic feet; fuel, 18,000,000,000 cubic feet, and mining timber, 150,000,000 cubic feet. If the reader will stop to consider that these appalling figures are given in "cubic" and not in "square" feet the amount becomes almost incredible.

At the present rate of cutting the remainder of the forest land in the United cannot long meet the enormous demands on its resources. Of the two most important timbers for building purposes the merchantable white pine of the northwest of New England is practically gone, very little remaining. Of the merchantable long leaf pine of the South only about 1,500,000,000 cubic feet remain. The valuable ash will probably be the first to be exhausted. Walnut trees are also going fast. Forest fires are estimated to destroy values of about $15,000,000 annually, but during the year of 1894 that amount appears to have been lost in Minnesota and Wisconsin alone.

The Forestry Association.

A national organization, known as the American Forestry Association, composed of delegates from all the States, meets annually to discuss the measures needed for the protection of the native forests. There are forest commissioners appointed in several States, but political machinations prevent much efficient work from being done. A bill to provide a systematic forest administration for Colorado, New Mexico, California, Arizona, Wyoming, Oregon and Washington was passed in both Houses of Congress last year, but failed to become a law.

The individual States have striven with more or less success to encourage tree planting by adopting a certain day in the year as arbor day, for the voluntary planting of trees by the people. There is no enterprise which should receive more encouragement from every resident and true lover of the country than this. The children of the public schools have lately been encouraged in the active participation of tree planting and it may be said that Young America has embraced the opportunity with all its wonted zeal. The second Wednesday in April is set aside in most States as arbor day, and it would be a direct blessing to the country if every teacher and school officer would impress its importance on the children in their charge.

Work in the Lumber Camps.

Wisconsin, Michigan and Minnesota still produce enormous quantities of timber, and are as yet the most favorable places to see the old-fashioned and up-to-date lumber camps. Before the approach of winter the sawmill owner projects his campaign for the logging season, planning it with all the care of a military campaign, and frequently with more forethought and ability. He selects his places of operation in the woods, locates his camps, builds his shanties and makes his logging roads. These are best done before the snow comes. A logging camp is located with reference to the nearest access to the timber intended to be operated upon. Though the work of hauling never begins till winter has fairly set in and there is snow enough to make good roads the thrifty logger is actually at work considerably before. He is choppping down trees, sawing them into logs of proper length and "skidding" them by the use of teams. Skidding is hauling them together into large piles and placing them on skids convenient for loading them on the sleds. A good team will haul from 1,000 to 2,000 feet from the woods to the stream. As 1,000 feet of logs will weigh more than two tons, an estimate may be made of the immense loads thus hauled. After a successful winter's work the river bank is piled full for miles along the stream with the log harvest, until some time during the month of March, when the season generally comes to an end.

In the States mentioned more than 75 per cent. of the men engaged for this rough work are Scandinavians, the Swedes possibly leading in number. They are a well-paid set of men and ask no favors, and, though they sometimes make things pretty lively in towns adjacent to the lumber camps, they are conscientious enough to pay for any damage done. If the camps are located too far from the logging camp, the men spend their leisure time the best way they know how. They smoke, wash and shave and mend their dilapidated garments. They read every available printed scrap to be found lying about the shanties, and hail with delight a newspaper, be it ever so old. These intervals of rest are offset by days when the men have to work like demons to accomplish a certain task. In the spring there occur the inevitable log jams. The log run of a good-sized mill reaches often 50,000,000 feet, and will occupy a river for from five to ten miles of its length. Then fifty men or more, armed with their eight-feet-long driving pikes, are skipping from the swift-flowing, bobbing logs to prevent them from being locked in a jam. When such a thing happens the logs are piled up into a monster barricade across the entire width of the river.

Work and Recreation.

While the life of the lumbermen in the forests of the Northern States is far from enviable, it is by no means devoid of pleasant incidents. It is, perhaps, because these are few and far between that they are all the more keenly enjoyed by these rugged sons of nature, who really from a distinct type from the ordinary farming population. Like the cowboy on the plains, they are gradually being pushed to extinction, and with them will disappear the magnificent forests that just now are being devastated by the all-absorbing greed of unscrupulous sawmill owners. These people often are found occupying quite large settlements in the deep woods. Here the customs of their native land still prevail, with very slight modifications. Social and religious affairs partake in a large measure of a distinct foreign flavor. An American here would not require any great stretch of imagination to fancy himself in some remote corner of northern Europe instead of being in his native country.

Recently there was a wedding in one of these settlements, which was an extremely picturesque and interesting event to the newspaper man who happened to be present. He was invited to participate in the festivities, and rashly accepted the invitation, little dreaming what a complicated affair it was to be.

Banns had been proclaimed for several consecutive Sundays in the modest little church that Ole Knutson and Britta Bengtsdotter were to be joined in wedlock. There was as much stir in this little community on this account as was occasioned by the Marlborough-Vanderbilt affair in New York. All the men, women and children for miles around considered themselves, according to the old country custom, as invited to the festivities.

Wedding Festivities.

Now, a Swedish or Norwegian wedding is a thing that is never settled in one or two days. It generally takes that many weeks for its preparation, and the same number for its celebration. Each guest usually contributes his share, no matter how humble, and everything is accepted with the warmest of thanks, not with surprise, but as a matter of course. Among the quaint customs observed on this occasion was noted one very curious. A number of the nearest of the bride's and bridegroom's relatives went into the wood at midnight and formed a circle at a place where three roads meet. They then asked a number of questions addressed to some unseen being or spirit. What the questions or answers are none of the party is permitted to divulge, as such a thing would surely bring constant ill luck to the prospective bride and groom. The following day the young girls who are to serve as bridesmaids congregate at the home of the bride. In these regions there is no particular display of flummery. The girls are neatly dressed in their best gowns and neckerchiefs. The bride was attired in the customary veil over her very handsome, though by no means extravagantly expensive, dress. No orange blossoms were seen. Instead of these the bride wore a little crown of myrtle. The bridegroom was a sturdy young fellow, foreman of a sawmill. He was rigged out in top boots and sack coat. The bride and groom were driven to church in an ordinary open bobsled, and the rest of the family followed in similar conveyances. It was a singularly picturesque sight to see this strange wedding procession wind its way through the deep snow to the little church. On the return trip there was music galore, furnished by an accordion and a cornet that had seen better days, but a jollier crowd was never brought together. Refreshments were served in superabundance, and dancing was kept up all night. These festivities are continued as long as the custom prescribes, generally at least three days. After this the hard, rough labor of the men is unshrinkingly resumed with a grateful thought that even in their life there is an occasional gleam of sunshine.

Treasure Transportation in China.

We have heard much, especially of late, of the diverting of public treasure to private gain by Chinese officials of all ranks, and the pitiable evidence of it in the failure of the Chinese army and navy to be ready for the inevitable struggle with Japan is too recent and convincing to be disputed; but on the other hand we can only wonder at the power of this law of responsibility which, in such a land, enables the remotest province to transport its dues to Peking in solid silver, by the simplest means, without loss by the way and without the protection of a single soldier. Nothing impresses one more with the absoluteness of this power as applied to transportation than to meet a line of pack-mules, horses, or camels, loaded with silver bullion. The silver is usually confined in rough logs of wood that have been split, hollowed out, and then bound together, and each load is marked with a little flag of imperial yellow, stating the amount and destination. That is all the protection there is except the ordinary drivers, who carry no weapons, and are attended by no guard. In what other land on the face of the globe could the same be done?—Century.

Cellulose.

Cellulose is of great value, it is said, as a material for rendering ships water tight after perforation by a shot. It is light, weighing only one-eighth as much as water, and is not liable to be destroyed by animal or vegetable enemies, no worm or fungus being known to attack it. It is applied by building against the ship's hull a coffer-dam of briquettes made of compressed cellulose placed inside a covering of waterproof material.

It is all right for a woman to keep a cow who also keeps her husband.

OBITUARY

Anna Farthing was born in Rock Bluffs, Neb., June, 8, 1871, and departed from this life at her home in Auburn on Tuesday, March, 3, 1896, at the age of 24 years, 8 months and 25 days. She spent the early part of her life with her parents near the place of her birth.

She was one of a family of nine children all of whom, excepting one brother, including father and mother, preceded her in death. On Sept. 29, 1889, she was joined in the holy bonds of matrimony to William Ludwig. To this union was born one son, Raymond, who with his father mourn the early departure of their best and truest friend. In the fall of 1891 she came with her husband to live in Auburn where she resided until death. Mrs. Ludwig has for nearly five years battled against the dreaded disease, consumption, which had taken father mother, brothers and sisters before her, with the exception of two who died in infancy. Last August she became bedfast and since that time has been a constant sufferer. Several month before her marriage she united with the M. E. church, of which she always remained a faithful member. She was always resigned to the will of her Maker in all things. She knew that she must die ere long, therefore, she prepared everything. She selected her hymns and singers, her shroud and everything necessary for burial. About one week before her death she became unconscious and remained so for two nights and one day, when consciousness and her lost senses were restored and she remained rational until death. She died very easy, not a struggle ensued. Death was welcome to her as she was prepared to meet her Savior. Her sufferings were so intense that she asked many, and herself, also, to pray for her release from such suffering. But she was very patient through all. She leaves her husband, one son, one brother and many other relatives and friends to mourn their loss. It is their great loss but her gain. She was kind and loving to all and was loved by all who knew her. She will be greatly missed by a large circle of neighbors and friends as well as relatives She was laid to rest in the beautiful Evergreen cemetery, Thursday afternoon, March 5.

A Remarkable Cure.

Mrs. H. B. Adams, 1609 Wabash ave., Chicago, says: "I had a scrofulous taint of the blood from childhood, which however, remained dormant. An ulcer began on the side of the nose, having all the appearance of a most malignant cancer. The agony of mind I suffered cannot be described as I contemplated the progress of such a malignant disease. Finally I was induced to try Foley's Sarsaparilla. It appeared to neutralize the poison in the blood. The growth of the ulcer ceased. The diseased tissues in the bottom and edges of the sore seemed to loosen and the natural flesh to take its place. No part of the disease remains." Robbins & McCord. 10-13

Still At It.

The latest phase of the Indiana apportionment quarrel is that the governor has refused to call an extra session of the legislature to make a new apportionment, as he thinks, first, that they are not likely to make very fair one, as the one, they made last winter, was about the most unfair the state ever had. In the second place, the governor says that if the opportionment law under which these members were elected is not constitutional then the members are not legally elected and can make no laws. In the third place it would seem that this legislature is not the empowered to this, but the legislature that is to be elected this fall, as the constitution seems plainly to show. In the fourth place, the governor thinks, that as the law of 1885 has not been pronounced unconstutional, it would be safest to elect a legislature under that law and then, they could make a new law, with less doubt as to its legality. And finally, he says the expense of an extra session would make him hesitate.

On the other hand the republicans have started a suit to test the law of 1885, believing that if it can be killed in time the legislature will have to be called to together. To offset this, the democrats threaten to put up a ticket in all fifty of the senatorial districts and not recognize any of the twenty-five holdover senators. So the matter stands.

RICHLAND.

The leap year at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Leins, on last Saturday evening Feb. 29, was a very pleasant one, the young ladies were invited to bring their own company. Those present were:

Misses, Joice Hosler, Laura Graham, Maud Rauer, Lewie Stonebraker, Hattie Harper, Florence Weimer, Agnes Daily, Grace Daily, Ona Finch, Effa Lutman, Rosa Zimmerman, Minnie Treesh, Myrtle Treesh, Mamie Mc Kee and Nora Rynearson, and Messrs, Jim Foote, Ed Miles, Lew Britton' John Harper, Homer Hall, Frank Finch, Cary Treesh, Frank Weimer, John Adams, Geo. Rynearson, Frank Gushwah, Rubie Childs, Frank Childs, Frank Tuttle, and Jack Harper

Everybody is barking with colds.

Adolph Parren will move his family in the back rooms of the old hotel building.

Jimme McDonald has bought the Cissin property.

Some of the young ladies got left and would not attend the leap year party, because they had no partners.

Little Ivor Leins is quite sick, has symptoms of lung fever. Dr. Phillips is treating him.

SUMMIT.

Mrs. Hattie Snowberger, of Steubenville, was the guest of Henry Snowberger and wife last Sunday.

Miss Florance visited her cousin, Miss Cora Elliott, last Sunday.

Mrs. Ellen Hains visited her mother, Mrs. C. Zimmerman and also her daughfer, Mrs. S. Rumsire, last week.

Elmore Derthick, of Waterloo, visited his aunt, Mrs Emma Lawson, a few days last week during vacation.

Mrs. Margaret McDougal has been sick the past week.

Thos. Baxter closed his term of school at Summit last Friday. Isaac Barker also closed his term last Thursday.

Married, at the residence of and by J. W. Zimmerman, justice of the peace, Feb. 3, 1896, Sherman N. Lock and Mabel Edsal, both of Ashley.

ASHLEY.

Through the management of Henry C. Bass, chief of the fire department and one of the best of the Wabash engineers, Ashley has a system of fire alarms equal to any city we know of. The system was completed last Thursday and on Friday at 10 a. m., was tried and found to be successful in every particular We hope we may not have an occasion to use the alarm soon, but we know when the alarm goes off we have a fire company that knows just how to go about their work and are always ready.

Dr. Hudson, presiding elder of the M. E. conference preached at the M. E. church here on last Friday, Saturday, and Sunday evenings.

A number of our people drove to Angola last Sunday to attend the meeting there, which is being conducted by the people of the Christian church, they report over one hundred converts in the four weeks meeting.

Jacob Kalb, one of our citizens is at Auburn this week sitting on the petit jury.

Miss Ida Husselman, one of our teachers, who has been sick for some time was able to go to work again last Monday.

The opening of the new hotel will occur this week, and then no one need leave Ashley on account of hotel accommodations.

The most Popular.

A canvass among the druggists of this place reveals the fact that Chamberlain's are the most popular proprietary medicines sold. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, especially, is regraded as in the lead of all throat trouble remedies, and as such, is freely prescribe by physicians. As a croup medicine, it is also unexcelled, and most families with young children keep a bottle always handy for instant use. The editor of the Graphic has repeatedly known Chamberlain's Cough Remedy to do the work after all other medicines had failed.—The Kimball S. D. Graphic. For sale at 25 and 50 cents per bottle by F. E. Davenport.

Change Location.

Monday's Daily.

To-day Dr. Carey gives up his office in the Kiblinger block to Dr. John Baxter, the latter continuing the practice of medicine from the same rooms.

Dr. Carey goes back to his old home at Spencerville where there is a better opening for him than even he has had here. First, it is his old home, and they have interests there. Then, too, there is but one physician in Spencerville, which fact alone is very favorable, as compared with the strong competition of eight or ten able physicians in Auburn. Dr. Carey's friends at Spencerville, have been all the time seeking to get him to locate there and their good words have had much to do, no doubt,, with the change. It is a very flattering prospet that opens up to him there. Dr. Carey has had more than the ordinary success of a new doctor, since locating here, He had many friends before coming and has added greatly to the list since. He has won friends everywhere by his gentlemanly treatment of all, and especially by his skill and success in his profession, people have been impressed with the fact that he is a thoroughly equipped physician and surgeon. These things will go equally far to secure and hold friends at the new location..

As a near neighbor of the COURIER and its staff, he has won good opinions from all, and will be greatly missed. We commend him to the good people of Spencerville and Concord township, and hope his harvest of honors and shekels may be abundant.

BUTLER.

Lawyer Rose and wife, who formerly resided in Butler, and who tried their fortunes in Kansas and gave it up, and afterward located in the fruit belt of Michigan, have been spending a week or two visiting Butler friends.

Boon Madden's have tired of country farm life and are again moving back to Butler. Our empty houses yawn to welcome all desirable newcomers.

Peter and Jacob Helwig's housekeeper, Miss Maxwell, had a very severe attack of illness last week. Her death was momentarily expected for several hours. She has so far recovered as to be up and around again.

Rev. Disrow filled the pulpit of the M. E. church at Waterloo last Sunday. Their minister, whose name escapes me, filled his pulpit here to the entire satisfaction of all who heard him.

Isaac Ochs, a once a familiar faced business man of Butler, now of Chicago, spent Friday and Saturday in Butler, in the interest of the New York Life Insurance Co.

Herman Hirsch, living on east Oak street, had a close call from fire last Friday. One of his family in passing out of the kitchen, closed the door with sufficient force to extinguish the jet of the gasoline stove. The gas escaped rapidly and its odor attracted Mr. Hirsch's attention who went into the kitchen, opened the door and window, closed the jet, and seeing some gasoline on the stove, struck a match and lighted it. In an instant the room was filled with flame, and a sheet many feet in length poured out of the open window that aroused the neighborhood. A pail of water well directed smothered it, but not until considerable damage was done to the room, stove, table curtains and clothing. His presence of mind in opening the door and window perhaps averted a much more serious disaster. Insured with J. A. Campbell.

Isaac Stiefel and Max Myers, who recently sought to try their fortunes in the ophir of America—Cripple Creek—have returned to Butler, concluding to dig gold out of Butler mud instead of the rocky chasms of Colorado.

CORUNNA.

Harmon Wise who has been quite poorly for some time is improving.

Hy Dawson's son is recovering from an attack of pneumonia.

Born on the 3d inst, to M. A. Boughman and wife, a 9½ pound boy. All doing well, especially the father.

Belle Gushwa and son started for their home on Evanston, Ill., last Friday night.

Rev. Speckein commenced a series of meeting at the M. E. church last Thursday. We understand that the U. B. people are going to join in and have a union meeting.

Henry Ernest of Fairfield township, whose life has been despaired of for some time, is recovering, so Dr. Phillips reports.

The liberal branch of U. B. church had a chopping bee at W. E. Sherlock's last Wednesday. The amount of wood cut was estimated at about 27 cords.

Dr. Phillips cures all forms of rupture by a painless method, and patients are able to perform ordinary labor while taking treatment.

Jonathan Gushwa has bought Noble Barker's interest in the meat market Lindsey & Barker. The firm name will now be Gushwa & Lindsey.

John Stonebraker and George Harmes while driving home from the lodge last Thursday night were upset in the ditch near Ed Orr's. No one was hurt, but next morning pieces of the buggy, and a clock pendulum were found where the wreck occurred.

Born to A. P. Griffith and wife on the 8th inst, a girl.

M. W. Drury, father-in-law of the postmaster, is lying very low from a stroke of paralysis. He is past 72 years of age, and the attending physician has no hopes of his recovery.

The World's Fair Tests showed no baking powder so pure or so great in leavening power as the Royal.

Another Scheme.

A Wholesale Grocery Concern of Dayton, O., Canvassing Auburn and Vicinity.

For some time past representatives of the wholesale grocery concern of Herr & Harley, of Dayton, Ohio, have been in the city and canvassed Auburn and vicinity taking orders for groceries. The date has been set for the delivery of these goods which is March 20th. They authorize their purchasers to come to the Lake Shore side track, Auburn for their goods, and if for any reason they should be out of the city to leave their money. We can see no reason why people in Auburn and vicinity should patronize such a concern. Our groceries here sell goods just as cheap and in many cases cheaper than this firm does. We know of one case where a gentleman bought a pound of pepper. While in one of our groceries he asked why they could not sell as cheap as the Dayton firm. He was informed that the price for pepper in quarter pound lots was just what he paid the Dayton firm, and if he would buy one pound at a time it would cost much less. Of course the Dayton firm will not sell in less quantities than a pound and so those who buy will have enough goods to last a long time. A pound of pepper will last an ordinary family for years and will soon lose its strength and become valueless. We believe our grocerymen should advertise more. They should carry a column of prices, and keep the public informed as to what they can buy groceries at of Auburn merchants. Then when the representatives of the Dayton house come around they can compare prices and see just what they have lost or gained by patronizing this firm. And further, if they buy groceries of any of our merchants, they will be first-class in every respect. If not you can take them back. If you buy of the Dayton firm and have paid your money, and the goods are inferior, all you can do is to keep quiet about the matter. As we have before mentioned we believe it would pay our merchants to quote their prices through the newspapers and let people everywhere know what groceries may be bought for in Auburn. As a rule grocerymen do little advertising, but here is a chance for them to gain trade by spending a few dollars.

Obituary.

Alona Casner Hartman was born December 25, 1851, and departed this life March 1, 1896, aged 44 years, 2 months and 6 days.

She was born in Crawford county, O., but came with her parents when but a child to DeKalb county, Indiana, in which she resided until her death. She was united in marriage with Aaron B. Hartman, August 16, 1868. To this union were born six children; the husband and four children and one grandchild survive her. She also leaves a mother, two brothers and one sister. A father two brothers, two children and two grandchildren preceded her to the next world.

She united with the M. E. church when but thirteen years of age and was a faithful member until a few years after her marriage, when she with her husband, united with the U. B. church for convenience in attendance, of which she contininued to be a faithful member until she was called from labor to reward.

She was a kind wife and loving mother and during the weeks of her suffering she was patient and calmly resigned to the Master's will, Even when she became conscious of the fact that she could not recover, she was still imbued with the same spirit of resignation, and and before she passed away conversed calmly with her husband, children and friends, saying that all was right; that she was trusting in Jesus and enjoined them not to be troubled in their hearts at her departure, but to trust in the same Lord and meet her in heaven. Thus she quietly fell asleep in the triumphs of a christian faith

She was active in church and Sabbath school and constant in deeds of kindness, leaves a large circle of relatives and friends, and will be greatly missed by all who knew her

The funeral was held at the U. B. church of Showers' corners, March 3, at 10 a. m., Rev. S. H. Yager officiating.

—Mrs. Clara McClellan and daughter returned yesterday from Wabash where they visited Mr. and Mrs. L. T. Rice. They also visited friends at Huntington and North Manchester.

—Don't invite disapointment by experimenting. Depend upon One Minute Cought Cure and you have immediate relief. It cures croup. The only harmless remedy that produces immediate results. Davenport the Druggist.

A. Lewis has an old English coin exactly like the silver sixpence of Charlie Rugman's that we spoke of the other day. Doubtless there are many old and rare coins among the people, if they could be brought to light.

—Sherman Dickinson had the misfortune to lose one of his horses last Monday. He was taking it to water, it stumbled and fell and in a few moments was dead. This falls very heavily on him just now when he is very busy and will soon need it to put out his spring crops.

J. D. High, a former DeKalb man, writes from Concordia, Kansas, that they have not had snow enough to track a rabbit so far this winter. He finds that times are pretty close out there as well as elsewhere. We are glad he gets the COURIER regularly and likes it.

—"Leap year finds five of the male printers in the COURIER office are unmarried, including the little devil." Now ladies don't all speak at once. This remark was made the other day, by a lady friend of the COURIER. But she has not quite all the facts. The unmarried list of the COURIER force is like the "Nine little Indians" that first ran down to "eight little Indians," then to "seven" etc. At present but two of the COURIER boys are unmarried and if all signs do not fail, it will soon be "One little printer devil, going home alone" etc. As for our girl printers, we cannot say, though they are very popular, of course.

Friday's Daily.

—Hon. W. F. McNagny, of Columbia City, was in the city yesterday.

It not only is so, it must be so, One Minute Cough Cure acts quickly, and that's what makes it go. Davenport, the Druggist.

—John Kraus, one of our farmer friends called up and added some cash to the COURIER fund yesterday.

A high liver with a torpid liver will not be a long liver. Correct the liver with DeWitt's Little Early Risers, little pills that cure dyspepsia and constipation. Davenport, the Druggist.

—Prof. Louis, the Psychopathic Physician at Swineford house every Thursday.

—Denny Eckler and family are the guests of the family of Chas. F. Bartels.

—Mrs. H. A. Croy, in Gas Addition is reported no better and is in a serious condition.

—John Provines says there is a conspiracy somewhere, between the democrats and the prohibitionists here to get his receiver's sale on March 19, the same day, the republican congressional convention is held here. He admits it was an oversight putting the sale on that day, as he would like to get around and shake hands with the boys again.

—L. Spitler has an old relic of the "industrial age" when work was done by hand. It is a drawing knife, used by Mrs. Spitler's grandfather in 1788, which is 108 years ago and is still as good as those of modern make. He also has a German New testiment translated by an Evangelist minister from English into that language in 1832, and a written "reward of merit" from his teacher of forty-seven years ago, in Ashland, Ohio.

The Discovery Saved His Life.

Mr. G. Caillouette, Druggist. Beaverville, Ill., says: "To Dr. King's New Discovery I owe my life. Was taken with Lagrippe and tried all the physicians for miles about, but of no avail and was given up and told I could not live. Having Dr. King's New Discovery in my store I sent for a bottle and began its use and from the first dose began to get better, and after using three bottles was up and about again. It is worth its weight in gold. We won't keep store or house without it" Get a free trial bottle at Robbins & McCord's drug store. 2

RESOLUTIONS.

Whereas, it has pleased him, "Who doeth all things for the best" to remove from our midst Dr. J. N. Chamberlain, of Waterloo, be it.

RESOLVED, That in the death of Dr. J. N. Chamberlain the DeKalb Co. Medical Society, has lost one of its most respected members, the family a kind husband and a loving father; the city of Waterloo a prominent citizen be it further.

RESOLVED, That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the minutes, published in the county papers, and a copy be sent to the bereaved family.

Saturday's Daily.

Allen's Foot-Ease, a powder to be shaken into the shoes, makes walking easy. Sold by all druggists and shoe stores, 25 cents. Over 2000 testimonials. Sample FREE. Address Allen S. Olmsted, Le Roy, N. Y.

—Our old friend John Bohler made this office his usual annual call yesterday.

—Phil Plum of Waterloo was in the city yesterterday.

E. R. Shoemaker, of Waterloo, was in the city today.

—The weather took another sharp turn last night, turning cold and partly freezing the all prevailing mud. There was a slight fall of snow.

—Leonard Shipe, of Fairfield township was over here yesterday. He is working for the Madden Brothers in the interest of their marble works.

One Minute Cough Cure touches the right spot. It also touches it at the right time if you take it when you have a cough or cold. See the point? Then don't cough.

Quick in effect, heals and leaves no scar. Burning, scaly skin eruptions quickly cured by DeWitt's Witch Hazel Salve. Applied to burns, scalds, old sores, it is magical in effect. Always cures piles.

Last season Ike L. Hall, druggist of West Lebanon, Indiana, sold four gross of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy and says every bottle of it gave perfect satisfaction. For sale by F. E. Davenport.

Monday's Daily.

—Miss Ida Stafford, of St. Joe was in the city to-day.

—Gen. Blair and daughter Rose of Waterloo, were in the city this afternoon.

—Sheriff Stroh brought Mose Mullinix over from Newville this morning and put him in jail. Mr. Mullinix has lost his mind.

—Miss Maud Williams returned today noon to her home at Denver, Col., after a stay of about four months with Auburn friends.

—Old Mrs. Somerlott, mother of John Somerlott, east of Waterloo, died last Thursday and was buried Saturday.

—H. G. Provines, of St. Joe, was in the city over Sunday the guest of friends. He is teaching school at St. Joe.

—Dills & Borst sent the big dogs, to Chicago to-day having entered them in the great dog show that begins there this week. They showed up like lions in their big cages.

—Amzia Brown says the winter must have been a pretty warm one, as he found some sprouts among the potatoes, he had "holed" up, that were over twenty inches long.

Mrs. Singrey, of Garrett, took morphine Saturday morning and died Saturday evening at 7 o'clock. We could not learn why she took her life, but suppose it was caused by trouble.

—The silver service donated by Indiana citizens for use on the new battle ship, Indiana, is a grand piece of workmanship. The entire set will weigh about 200 lbs, and is of course worth a good deal of money, besides its value as metal. The silver is solid and of coin value and fineness. The rest of the money goes to create a library for the ship. This new vessel is the finest and most formidable in our navy.

—Charles L. Thomas at Omaha, Neb. sends in his usual remittance this week. We are always glad, on general principles, to hear of the welfare of former DeKalb citizens. Mr. Thomas has for several years been a prominent member of the city council, and we see by his letter head that he is chairman of the committee on gas, and electric lighting. His business, proper, is dealing in real estate in which we believe he has succeeded well.

The COURIER comes up smiling with the first snake story of the spring. Last Friday evening, as the scholars of Dist. No. 1, in Jackson township were going home from school, they saw a snake lying in their path. They were small children but they managed to kill it, as it was cold and so could not run well. They took it to Aaron Carper's and he measured it, finding it three feet, eight inches. It was of the kind known as "blue racer." The children feel that they have "killed the first snake" as the old saying goes.

SILAS BARTLETT.

Special to Daily Courier.

ST. JOE, IND., MARCH 10, 1896.

Died at Newville, Sunday evening at at 8 o'clock, Silas H. Bartlett, aged 71 years. Mr. Bartlett was an old resident, having come to this county with his father in the thirties. His father at first settled on what is now known as the Countryman farm, and died there forty-five years ago. Silas, as he was familiarly called, always made this county his home and it can be said of him that the world has been better for his being in it. He leaves a devoted wife, two sons and two daughters and a host of friends who will sadly miss him.

To Consumptives.

As an honest remedy Foley's Honey and Tar does not hold out false hopes in advanced stages, but truthfully claims to give comfort and relief in the very worst cases, and in the easly stages to effect a cure. Robbins & McCord. 10-13

All last winter Mr. Geo A. Mills, of Lebanon, Conn., was badly afflicted with rheumatism, At time it was so severe that he could not stand up straight, but was drawn over on one side. —Carrie and Emma Beuret are home from Detroit after several months spent there in school learning short hand and type writing. They reached home last evening.

—Amzia Brown had the misfortune to lose one of his mules last Thursday. It was quite a loss as it breaks up a team just when he will soon need it.

The Christian Endeavor of the Lutheran church will give an Easter social in lecture room on Friday evening April 3. Further notice will be given in the near future.

—W. W. Wyrick, of Ashley, was in the swim at the court house yesterday. But the case for which he is attorney did not come off. He is now actively connected with the pants factory at Ashley, and talks some of abandoning the law.

—Adam P. Cunningham and wife and little daughter, of Whitley county, came over yesterday and are here, to visit the family of Rev. H. A. Croy. Mrs. Croy, who is very sick yet, is a sister of Mr. Cunningham. He called up to see us and renew old-time acquaintance. Mr. Croy who was with him reports Mrs. Croy quite sick yet, and little hope of being better.

—J. G. Clapp, our wide-awake photographer returned last night from Indianapolis where he has spent the last week attending a meeting of the Progressive Photographers' Association. Mr. Clapp is sparing neither time nor money to give the people of Auburn and DeKalb county the latest in photography. Parties who desire first-class up-to date work always patronize Mr. Clapp.

CANT TRUST THEM.

Not a repulican paper in Indiana, as far as we have heard, makes an attempt to defend the apportionment made by the present legislature, which was the most outrageous the state ever had. Yet they all or nearly all, ask the governor to call this same legislature together again to make a new apportionment, on the very thin plea that they have promised to make a more honest one. But they were elected two years ago on this same plea and proved false to their promises. No wonder that Gov. Matthews felt he could not trust them to try it again.

Card of Thanks.

I wish th thank sincerely the kind friends and neighbors who gave their their assistance and sympathy during the sickness and death of my wife. And especially to the order of A. O. U. W. and the Ladies the Degree of Honor. I wish to return thanks for the same.

Liquor Licenses.

The commissioners have granted the following liquor licenses up to this afternoon:

E. P. Refner, Albert Zervis, John Berg, Auburn; H. Riccius, John Sabriske, Peter F. Behler, Garrett; W. F. Shaver, Allen Park, Waterloo; and Daniel E. Lung, Wm. H. Ryan, Auburn Junction.

COURT,

Work began again on Monday. The timber case between Anthony Zonker and the Nickey Co. was called up as both parties were ready. But after talking the matter over between the attorneys and the judge, it was decided there was not enough at stake to justify a suit, or at least it would not pay the parties to go on and the whole thing was dropped, The grand jury reported the work they had done and were discharged. Pearl Feagler was called up and would have been tried but the prosecuting witness the man he had the trouble with did not appear and cannot be found by the officers. So the trial will have to be postponed till the witness can be brough in.

SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR
THE BEST
SPRING MEDICINE
Is SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR—don't forget to take it. The Liver gets sluggish during the Winter, just like all nature, and the system becomes choked up by the accumulated waste, which brings on Malaria, Fever and Ague and Rheumatism. You want to wake up your Liver now, but be sure you take SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR to do it. It also regulates the Liver—keeps it properly at work, when your system will be free from poison and the whole body invigorated.
You get THE BEST BLOOD when your system is in A1 condition, and that will only be when the Liver is kept active. Try a Liver Remedy once and note the difference. But take only SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR—It is SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR which makes the difference. Take it in powder or in liquid already prepared, or make a tea of the powder; but take SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR. You'll find the RED Z on every package. Look for it.

Hereafter, all resolutions inserted in the DAILY and WEEKLY COURIER will be charged for at 3 cents a line and cards of thanks, at 25 cents each. Also, all anouncements for churches, socials and entertainments will appear under the head of "anouncements." Any society desiring to place locals in with our personals may do so by paying the same price that the business men pay for local advertising. Too much of our valuable space has been used by these announcements and many times reading matter has been crowded out. Remember that hereafter this rule will positively be in force.

New Dress.

The WEEKLY comes to its readers this week with nearly all the old type weeded out, and the last piece will be gone next issue. The new dress has cost a good sum of money and we hope our efforts will be appreciated to the extent, that every one who knows there is subscription due us, will send it in. We have waited long on many and feel that we have done fully our share to make the close times easier. Now let us have your help. Very few but can raise these little sums, if they try as hard as we often have to.

—The ladies of the Presbyterau church will give a social supper in the basement parlors on Wednesday evening March 18. Remember the date.

—"We have started in to double our trade this year" is the explanation given by the Foster Furniture and Carpet Co., of Fort Wayne. when asked recently why they had commenced cutting prices at such a fearful rate.

RIGHT IN IT.

The fine carpet trade of Fort Wayne is now being done by the Foster Furniture and Carpet, Co., Their Carpet room is the handsomest in the state, running through from Court all the way to Clinton street. Carpets and Furniture naturally go together. This firm sends its carpet layers into any of the towns surrounding Fort Wayne when desired. This is a very important as fine carpets are often spoiled in laying.

FARNER A. BARNES, - - PUBLISHER.

It is estimated that the Nansen expedition will cost about $125,000. If it has failed in its purpose as regards the North Pole Freedom will emit another loud shriek.

There is nothing in which a young business man should take more pride than in the reputation that whatever he pledges himself to do will within all human probability be faithfully performed.

As the popular voice is but the combined voices of many individuals, so each one, in giving his share of praise and blame, is an active agent in producing one class of conduct and in diminishing another.

Friendship consists properly in mutual offices and a generous strife in alternate acts of kindness. But he who does a kindness to an ungrateful person sets his seal to a flint and sows his seed upon the sand. Upon the former he makes no impression, and from the latter he finds no production.

The only way of keeping a secret is to forget it as soon as communicated. A person may have a considerable reputation for consistency in this matter, thus easily acquired. The only secret worth knowing in this life is how one man can contrive to be better than another; all the rest is mere alchemy.

The receipts of the Manchester Ship Canal increased 70 per cent. last year, and the outlook of the costly work is a little more favorable. It would be more to the purpose to call the big ditch an extension of the harbor of Liverpool to Manchester. It is not a true ship canal, facilitating the marine commerce of the world, but merely marks the rivalry between two large cities.

It is false and indolent humility which makes people sit still and do nothing, because they will not believe they are capable of doing much, for everybody can do something. Everybody can set a good example, be it to many or few; everybody can, in some degree, encourage virtue and religion, and discountenance vice and folly; everybody has some one whom they can advise and instruct, or in some way help to guide through life.

Virtue is so much a unit that no one of its parts can be deficient without the whole being injured. All virtues are interdependent. He who knows no mercy can never be truly just, and he who scorns justice can never be truly generous. He who is wasteful and improvident can give no efficient help to others, and he who is selfish and miserly is certainly not his own best friend. The very insensibility to all merits but one's own displays so gross an ignorance and so low a standard that it must always lower a man in the eyes of every discerning person.

There is doubtless a good deal of gold at Cripple Creek, but there will be more there than there is now if the boomers can succeed in the mining operations they are carrying on in the pockets of investors all over the world. The interests of the Cripple Creek promoters are served by literary bureaus as able and well organized as those that used to run their drifts into the purses of the American public for the benefit of the Louisiana lottery. The man that has a shining $20 piece in his pocket has a better gold mine than he will ever get by going in on the top floor of the Colorado boom, and he will do well not to let it be lured away from him by the magnetic pen of the literary boomer.

The Maher-Fitzsimmons fight was held without police interference, but the contestants had to go outside the territory of the United States, and even then they had to be vigilant in order to elude the Mexican soldiers. This is a great improvement over the situation of a few years ago, when these exhibitions, with the aggregations of toughs which congregated around them, were flouted in the face of public sentiment in several States of the Union. Like the Louisiana lottery, the prize-fight has been driven outside the confines of the United States. Both institutions outlived their day. Both are an offense to civilization, and neither is likely to be tolerated again in the United States.

After years and years of warning and instruction it seems that a certain sort of confiding stranger has not yet mastered the dangers of the gold brick, the weighted dice and the man who shifts the location of three little cards while you wait. The recent experience of a gentleman from Wyoming who produced a "roll" in a Chicago saloon and then allowed three affable gentlemen to shake dice with him is a proof that further instructions still are necessary. For the sake of confiding and trustful strangers who may be overweighted with money some cautions should be published: On arriving in the city with your money always show the cash to the first man you meet. If approached in a groggery by a man who wants to show you some scenery down by the freight cars on the lake front always accept cheerfully, especially if it is growing dark. When a stranger with three shells and a small pellet wants you to bet him that you can tell under which shell the pellet is concealed always take him up. When you fail to guess right double the bet. If your stay in the city is to be short, however, tie your "roll" up in a bag with a couple of bricks, take the bag down to the lake front and throw it in. This latter expedient has the advantage of saving time and obviating the physical inconvenience occasionally inflicted by the man with the dice box and the three little shells. With a little precautionary advice like this no stranger, no matter how unsophisticated he may be, ought to leave the city without getting an abundance of really useful and helpful experience.

A most remarkable change in the production of locomotive force was discussed a few days ago at a meeting of railroad officials held in Pittsburg for the purpose of considering the introduction of electro-motive power to supplant the use of steam on the Pennsylvania Railroad system. It was shown that while the last few years have witnessed an extraordinary development in the construction of electric railway apparatus, in generators, motors, methods of distribution, etc., there still remains one thing to be done to make the electric motor a complete and satisfactory substitute for the steam locomotive. This "one thing needful" in the railroad work of the future is the gas engine, and it is particularly desirable to introduce it on the score of economy. It is a wonderful fuel saver. It was stated that a locomotive consumes on the average eight times as much coal as would be required to operate a properly constructed gas engine to do the same amount of work. Hence the substitution of one for the other would give a vast saving in cost. The present consumption of coal on the Pennsylvania lines is from five to six million tons per annum. The four million tons which would be saved by the use of the gas engine cost the company more than five billion dollars, and it is claimed that this difference would justify the expenditure of a sufficient amount of capital to completely equip the lines for the new kind of motor service. It was pointed out that the electric locomotive adopted on the new plan would be radically different from the present one. The hauling of twenty-five to thirty cars is as much as is desirable to assign to a single locomotive, and its weight and capacity may be adapted to that limit of work. Such a locomotive could be operated by one man, and the strain on the roadbeds, bridges and cars could be materially lessened by dividing the propulsion force, putting one engine in the middle of a long train and another at its head. Also this division of the power required to move the train would reduce to convenient limits the force of the current. But it is stated that this subdivision would be a mere matter of convenience, as even in the present state of the art of locomotive building an electric motor could be built with a greater hauling capacity than any steam locomotive that yet has been turned out of any shop. The use of gas in an engine for the evolution of power has long been known to have the advantage that it takes up a large quantity of air to make an explosive mixture, the use of the air more than compensating for the loss of force by the cooling of the gas, while with steam the force of only a small part of the heat employed is actively exerted to move the piston. But the business world has been timid till now in making the substitution on any other than a small scale. If, however, the gas engine can be employed with the important saving here noted, and with a conquering of the mechanical difficulties hitherto encountered, there would seem to be a prospect of a comprehensive change in the methods of railroad locomotion, and in the operation of stationary power plants as well, in the course of the next few years. The change, if practicable, should be embraced with special eagerness in the British Islands, where cheapness is a great desideratum and the coal supply is shrinking at a rate which could not be kept up many years longer without making coal much more scarce there than it is now.

LIGHT-SHEDDING CANE.

Novel Invention Recently Patented—Good for Dark Places.

A novel cane has recently been patented. It is hollow, and the interior is filled nearly to the top with the necessary chemical solution. The knob is really an incandescent bulb, with an ornamental and protective covering of nickel or silver, which either unscrews or flies open at a touch upon a spring.

The poles of the battery extend in to the hollow of the cane, but not far enough to reach to the acid. But when a light is desired, the cane is held knob downward, the acid attacks zincs, and the electricity generated lights the bulb. They give out a really surprising amount of light, and last nearly two hours. There is no waste of material when the light is not in use, as no electricity is generated except when the cane is turned upside down and the acid so brought in contact with the zincs. So a single filling may last for weeks or months. When the bulb is burned out, or the zincs are eaten away, or the acid loses its strength, the owner can easily reload the cane, as the supplies can be bought for a trifle.

The Coteau Hills.

The Coteau range in Eastern South Dakota is a most interesting subject of study, both from a geological and a botanical point of view. This Coteau—a low, broken range of hills about twenty miles wide, surmounting an elevated plateau—has an altitude of 2,000 feet. It enters the State from the southeast at Gary, and crosses the north line near the north corner of the Sisseton Reservation. It is the terminal moraine of the great glacier which enveloped Minnesota and the Northwest, which, moving southwesterly, loosened its grip and slumped its load along this line. A very remarkable conglomeration was that load. There are heaped in confusion almost every soil and rock known to the geologist, of course broken to gravel or ground to clay by the ice, while mixed through it so thoroughly and so generally that almost every shovelful of the gravel yields up traces of gold, silver, iron, copper and other minerals. Gem stones abound in great variety, and some are valuable. A lady visiting in Gary picked up a native brilliant, for which she accepted $200 from a Chicago jeweler, and D. F. Youngs, a farmer near town, received $85 for one he found in the earth thrown up by a pocket gopher.—Minneapolis Journal.

An old man who marries a young wife may have good taste, but he has poor sense.

If you want to be a man, your first resolve should be to pay your debts.

POLITICS OF THE DAY

TWO TARIFFS.

The idea that the Wilson tariff is free trade is again started on the rounds. The official reports say that for the first fiscal year of this tariff the average ad valorem rate of duty upon all dutiable goods imported was 41.75 per cent. The annual average for the four years of the McKinley tariff was 48.66 per cent. The Wilson tariff collected in duties, $17,500,000 more during its first year than the McKinley tariff did in its last year. Perhaps some of the protectionists will explain how a tariff averaging 41.75 per cent. lacks the element of protection.

Some things are on the free list, to be sure, as wool and lumber; but to suppose that everything on the list is free is to shock the intelligence of those who know what a stone wall may be implied by the figures of a 41.75 per cent. duty. In both the Wilson and McKinley tariffs will be found many duties so high as to be prohibitory. The annual average of the value of dutiable goods imported under McKinleyism was $369,977,534, while under the Wilson tariff's first year it was $354,271,990. The flood of dutiable imports is officially in McKinley's favor, though the partisans may strive with might and main to lay it on the Wilson tariff.—Rome (N. Y.) Sentinel.

Isn't It Curious?

That the party which enacted the McKinley tariff for the purpose of reducing customs revenues, is now clamoring for an opportunity to restore the same law under the pretext that it will increase revenues?

That the manufacturers who always pay as little as possible for labor, and fight the demands of their employes for more pay, should contribute to the campaign funds of a party which promises to increase the wages of all workingmen?

That Republican papers should loudly denounce trusts and monopolies, while upholding the class legislation and special tariff privileges which enable those enemies of the public to plunder the people?

That in spite of their experience under thirty years of protection, during which they were robbed by high taxes and high prices, there are still farmers who vote for the Republican party and higher duties?

That the workingmen whose wages were cut down in 1893 while the McKinley law was in operation, and advanced in 1895 under the Wilson tariff, should now listen to the agents of the monopolists who tell them that protection raises wages?

That the high taxationists can never agree among themselves as to whether their policy makes prices higher or cuts them down?

That the same men who denounce free trade because it makes goods cheaper, praise protection because they claim it increases competition and lowers prices?

That the freer exchange of products between two countries under the name "reciprocity" is a good thing, but under a "low tariff" policy is bad for both countries?

Pin Them Down to a Plain Issue.

Half of the protectionist arguments are devoted to showing that a high tariff benefits American manufacturers by shutting out the competition of cheap foreign goods, and thus raising the prices of domestic products. As the manufacturers all want to get as much as possible for their products they join the Republicans in working for higher duties.

The other half of the pleas for a return of McKinleyism are made up of assertions that protection greatly increases domestic competition, and thereby forces prices lower than they would be under free trade. As everybody who buys things wants to get them as cheaply as possible, the pretense that protection makes cheapness is attractive to those who accept Republican statements without investigation. The result is that men who want things to be dear, and men who want them cheap, vote together for a high tariff policy.

It should be easy for Democrats to show that both of these claims for protection cannot be true. Putting high taxes on imports cannot increase prices and at the same time reduce them. To expose the duplicity of the Republicans it is only necessary to insist that they shall give a square answer to the question: "Does protection make goods dearer or cheaper?" That is a question that will compel the advocates of higher duties to declare for either low or high prices. It will be no longer possible for them to straddle the issue.

McKinley vs. Wilson.

If the Republican batle-cry be McKinley and a protective tariff the Democrats could not do better than name the quiet and earnest school-teacher, the splendid orator and well-grounded statesman, Postmaster General Wilson, of West Virginia. Wilson would be entirely acceptable to the East as well as the West, and his candidacy would arouse the South to a high pitch of enthusiasm and make its solidarity an assured factor in the contest. If the Republicans should nominate McKinley the campaign would necessarily hinge on the tariff question, and with the champions of the two schools pitted against each other the Democrats might well exclaim, "The Lord hath delivered the enemy into our hands."—Kansas City Times.

Our Infant Tea Industry.

There was a hearing before the committee on ways and means the other day on the question of putting a duty of 10 cents a pound on tea. It did not come up as a question of revenue. Indeed, the advocates expressly excluded that idea. What they want is some measure which will exclude the poorest qualities of tea which reach this country—the kinds they call "trash." These teas, they say, are sold here by the cargo at 10 cents per pound or less, and then put up in prize packages and worked off at 50 cents per pound. This practice, they say, has nearly spoiled the regular tea trade. A duty of 10 cents would break up the prize-package business. It would be a tax of 100 per cent. or more on the invoice value. The remarks made by members of the committee showed that they did not approve of a duty on tea unless it could be shown that it would "protect" somebody in this country. This was exactly what the petitioners were prepared to do. They had among their number a tea-grower of South Carolina, who said that he had been making experiments in that line for half a dozen years, but that he could not possibly compete with these inferior teas. This fact gives some ground for believing that the committee may accede to the petition.—New York Evening Post.

Why Increase the Duty?

The Philadelphia Press, a newspaper which urges that the pending Dingley-McKinley tariff bill, with its increase of existing duties by 15 per cent., should be passed without delay, reports that this country has "won in an important competition for the sale of 12,000 tons of steel rails" to be used in Chile. "The proposition was made by Chile some time ago," we are told by the Press, "both in the English markets and those of the United States for prices for these rails," and the American bidders have been successful. It may fairly be inferred that their bid was lower than that of the English manufacturers.

The duty on steel rails in the present tariff is $7.84 per ton. The plea of the McKinley protectionists is that this duty or a higher one is needed to keep out the "flood" of English rails which would be imported if there were no tariff tax. How does it happen, we ask the Press, that the American manufacturer of rails can undersell the English manufacturer in Chile, where the two compete on even terms, if the American manufacturer cannot undersell the English manufacturer here in the home market except with the assistance of the tariff handicap of $7.84 per ton? And, if our manufacturers of rails can undersell the English in Chile, without the aid of any tariff protection whatever, why is it necessary or desirable that the present duty of $7.84 should be increased to $9.01?—New York Times.

Receipts of Revenue Increasing.

The government's receipts of revenues have increased so much during the past month as to suggest the possibility of the deficit for the present fiscal year being reduced to little or nothing by the end of this year.

The receipts for January, 1896, were $29,237,670, of which $16,380,796 were from customs. In December last the total receipts were only $26,288,937.

At the January rate the treasury's receipts for twelve months would be $350,852,040. The receipts from all sources for the seven months ending with January were $196,805,724, of which more than one-half ($98,722,070) was derived from tariff duties on imports. Taking the depressing circumstances in which the import trade has recently been placed by the action of Congress, this is a very encouraging result, showing that the Wilson tariff is a much better revenue-producer than it has been generally reputed.

The McKinley law from January, 1891, to August, 1894, yielded an average monthly revenue from customs nearly a million dollars less than the Wilson law yielded in customs last month. The proposed Dingley bill would be no material improvement on the Wilson law as a measure for raising revenue, and therefore it could not help the treasury. But its enactment would cause great disturbance of all the business and commerce of the country and would work hardship to all classes of consumers.—New York Herald.

Explaining Protectionist Stories.

The McKinley editors open their campaign with the astonishing claim that woolen mills in this country are closing because the wicked Democrats untaxed their raw material. The editors insist that woolen manufactures cannot thrive unless the cost of wool is enhanced by a tax. They fail to explain how it is that the woolen mills of every other country in the world, even those having protective tariffs, manage to thrive with free wool. Nor do they tell why our cotton, silk, leather and boot and shoe manufacturers get on so well with untaxed raw materials. The real explanation of the alleged phenomenon is the old one: "The boy lied."—New York World.

Fact and Theory in Collision.

"Whenever there is anything to be done for this country," said Major McKinley to the Chicago Republicans, "it is to the Republican party we must look to have it done." As a theory this is altogether lovely. As a fact Speaker Reed has told the Republican House that it mustn't do anything this session, and the free silver octopus has told the Republican Senate the same thing.—Philadelphia Record.

To Light the Protection Fires.

There is a hint of another fat-frying circular in the complaint of the Minneapolis Journal (Rep.) that "the work of the Republican National League has been embarrassed not a little by the lack of funds with which to carry on its work. The situation," the Journal says, "suggests the necessity of providing some reasonably certain source of revenue."—New York Evening Post.

Should Be a State Issue.

The Democrats of the West have been long united on the proposition that Senators should be elected by the people. If they want to accomplish results they should not be content with putting the idea into the national platform, but should make it an issue in the several States.—St. Louis Republic.

Fraudulent Pretenses.

Who filled Pennsylvania with the cheapest imported European laborers? The highly protected coal and iron monopolists. And yet they say they want a tax on iron and coal in order to "keep up American wages."

Dan Furguson, an aged colored barber of Wabash, is meeting with success in his lecture on Abraham Lincoln. Mr. Furguson is of unusual intelligence and an ex-slave.

Anderson preachers are on a crusade against cigarettes. Petition will be presented to the City Council, asking that an ordinance be passed preventing any person under 18 from using the "coffin-nails."

W. E. Hand, of Argus, has been experimenting in the progagation of a new fruit called crannels. The plant grows upright and has a rich foliage. Other points in Northern Indiana will grow it, next year.

An electric railway will be built either from Logansport to Frankfort or from Logansport to Noblesville, and one from Rochester east through Fort Wayne to Celina, Ohio, both by a syndicate of Eastern capitalists.

Samuel Rigney a poineer and the of wealthy farmers of Vigo County, died recently from hiccoughing. He has been suffering with hiccoughs for several months, and they caused paralysis, which resulted in his death.

A tramp in Wabash County works the farmers by representing himself as a pole climer for the Western Union Telegraph Company. He carries a pair of pole climbers and gives orders on the company in lieu of paying for meals.

The Christian, Presbyterian, Methodist, and United Presbyterian Churches of Rushville have united to hold a big revival to begin March 22 and continue two weeks. The noted evangelist, Rev. Edgar L. Williams of Peoria, Ill., will conduct the meeting.

John L. Orr, of North Webster, is lying at the point of death, the result of drinking by mistake a cup full of lye. The old gentleman thought the lye was cider and did not discover his error until he had drank a considerable quantity of the liquid. Hope of his recovery has been abandoned.

Gas wells about Farmland drilled eight years ago were considered worthless and capped. Farmland's gas came from Delaware County, five miles away. Recently a cap removed from one of the old wells developed a powerful flow of gas and now the town is supplied from the abandoned well. The supposition is that a gas field changes from place to place as time passes.

A smooth young fellow swindled the farmers about Franklin, recently. He went about representing himself to be a collector of statistics for the government, and asked many questions about deceased relatives and friends. Later another "chap" appeared and presented them memorial cards giving a short account of the dead person, with a verse or two of a hymn, for which $2.50 was collected.

Judge Ellison fined James Kirkham, $25 for contempt of court at Anderson. Kirkhan refused to tell the Judge about his property when interrogated by the latter during a trial in which alimony was demanded. The Judge became indignant and warned Kirkham but the lefter answered insultingly, when he was fined and then created a sensation by saying, "Well, good-bye, Judge," and grabbing his hat, ran out of the room, down stairs and headed for home. A bailiff and two constables took after him and a crowd of citizens helped capture him and bring him back. The Judge then added sixty days in jail to the fine.

Kokomo has secured a new manufacturing industry for the construction of threshing machines and attachments for grain separators, capitalized at $50,000. It will employ two hundred men when in full operation. J. T. Collins is president and general manager of the new company.

Six prisoners, awaiting trial for burglary and similar offenses escaped from jail at South Bend. They sawed through the top of a cell and then let themselves down from the roof with ropes made from blankets. The escaped prisoners are Bert and Will Anderson, Thomas Clark, John Hempenstall, William Cahill and Thomas McHenry.

Edna Addington, a small school girl, north of Farmland, while jumping a rope burst a blood vessel in the lungs, and came near bleeding to death before medical assistance could be secured. She was trying to jump the rope a thousand times without stopping.

Harley Ephret, a prominent young man of Brazil, was fatally injured in the Ehrlich mine at Seelyville. Ephret, with three companions, was working on a temporary scaffold, fixing the cribbing in the air shaft of the mine, when the earth at the side gave way. Ephret fell to the bottom of the shaft, seventy feet below, breaking five ribs and sustaining internal injuries. His three companions caught in the frame work and were rescued.

NO PLACE FOR THEIR INSANE.

Terrible State of Affairs in Penitentiaries of Indiana.

Secretary Bicknell, of the State Board of Charities, reports a pitiful condition of affairs with respect to the insane convicts in the prison south, four of whom are confined in the institution. The prison officials are unable to properly care for them, or to place them so that their cries will not disturb their fellow convicts. There are no padded cells in the prison, and when these insane convicts become violent they dash themselves against the iron bars and throw themselves upon the stone floor, bruising their faces and limbs frequently in the most ghastly manner. The only way they can be restrained is by stretching them at full length and tying them hand and foot. Life in such a position is scarcely better than death. Meanwhile their hideous screams, night and day, keep piercing the ears of the other convicts.

"No more pitiful sight can be imagined," says Secretary Bicknell, "than these insane convicts raging in their dark, hard cells. It must bring terrible thoughts to the other convicts."

It is claimed that no one is particularly at fault because of this sad condition of the convict insane. The Governor is empowered to order removal to the insane hospitals, and such removals have been made. As a rule, however, the hospital managers are averse to receiving such patients, not only because they are likely to escape in case they recover their mental faculties, but because the relatives and friends of other insane patients object to the convicts being entered for treatment.

All of the insane hospitals of the State are now overcrowded, with at least 250 applications for admission awaiting final action. Additions are now being made at three of the State institutions which will permit the admission of possibly 400 additional patients. Fully that many, if not more, of crazy people are now in the various jails and county poor houses, the violent ones usually confined in the jails, with their condition very little better than that of the convicts to whom Secretary Bicknell refers.

MURDERED BY SALOONKEEPER.

Freeman Pritchett Is Beaten and Kicked to Death.

A murder occurred at Fowler Friday night. Early in the evening Frank Ducharme entered a saloon owned by Freeman Pritchett and pawned the latter a watch for $1. He returned about 11 o'clock to redeem the pledge, when Pritchett refused to deliver the watch until he had been paid a 90-cent whisky bill, which he claimed Ducharme owed him.

Ducharme was ordered to leave the saloon. He refused and the proprietor came from behind the bar and struck him in the face, knocking him senseless. Bystanders interfered, but Pritchett broke away and again assaulted his fallen victim by planting his foot in his face. He then dragged the lifeless body into the street and left it leaning against a fence. Later Pritchett's friends loaded the body into a baggage cart and were in the act of hauling it away when Night Policeman Morris Crissey appeared and took charge. In the meantime Pritchett had been assisted out of town, but he was arrested at Earl Park at daylight just as he was boarding a Chicago train. He was given a preliminary hearing and bound over to await the result of the grand jury investigation. His plea will be self-defense.

SIX PRISONERS ESCAPE.

Bold Jail Delivery at South Bend—Ropes Made of Blankets.

The boldest jail delivery in the history of northern Indiana occurred at South Bend the other night and was not discovered until the cells were opened at breakfast time next morning. It was seen that something was wrong and a count of the prisoners showed six missing. The escaped prisoners sawed through the top of a cell, effecting an entrance on to the roof, and then let themselves down with ropes made from blankets. They are Bert and Will Anderson, brothers; Thos. Clark, John Hempenstall, William Cahill and Thomas McHenry. The Anderson brothers were awaiting trial for wholesale robbery, and had they been cleared would have been held for attempting to murder Turnkey Charles Van Lake. McHenry is charged with cutting and almost murdering a man in a Lake Shore box car west of South Bend a few weeks ago. Cahill was awaiting trial for receiving stolen goods and Clark for petit larceny. Hempenstall had recently served a fourteen-year term in the Indiana prison north and was held for larceny. The men are still at large and there is no clew to their whereabouts.

Minor State News.

C. J. Cobleigh, proprietor of the piano case factory at Terre Haute, made an assignment. The liabilities are estimated at $40,000 and the property assigned at $70,000, subject to a mortgage of $23,000.

Sheriff Alexander arrived at Marion from Alexandria, having in custody Chas. P. Reigg, who is charged with forging the name of Henry Davis to a note for $45, which was sold to Charles E. Fogy. On being arraigned he pleaded not guilty and was sent to jail in default of a $1,000 bond.

Charles Rodgers, of Logansport, sued William Hollis for $5,000 for alienating his wife's affections. Both are farmers, and a few days ago had a personal encounter in which each was wounded in the hand while struggling for the possession of a revolver. Mrs. Rodgers is a sister to Mrs. Hollis, who is dead.

Miss Ella Connaughton, of Farwell, aged 17, had her left eye bitten from its socket and her nose lacerated by an enraged goose which she caught to kill for her parents' silver wedding jubilee. The physicians hope to save the girl's life, if fever of the optic nerve does not ensue, but her beauty is marred forever.

The crusade inaugurated by all Christian working bodies of Anderson against the cigarette habit was advanced from all pulpits Sunday. The Council will enact an ordinance identical with the law recently passed at Lincoln, Neb., instructing the police to make arrests and prescribing a fine of not less than $25 in any case where a person under 18 years of age is caught smoking a cigarette.

Louis Duenweg, of Terre Haute, had been wishing that his handsome two-story residence at Lake Maxinkuckee was on the other side of the lake, and regretted the fact that the country surrounding the shore for three miles was too hilly to make removal possible. When the cold snap froze the ice to a thickness of eighteen inches he moved the house down to the lake and then slid it on the ice. From there across the lake it was an easy job.

Twenty years ago Harry Grant was a popular young man at Delphi. He was appointed deputy county auditor and was found short $1,000 in his accounts. Owing to the prominence of his family the matter was hushed up and the young man skipped out. He went to Muncie and assumed the name of Charley Reed. For fifteen years he was a hostler in Thomas' livery stable, and was considered as one of the proprietor's family until he took to drinking two years ago. Finally he stole a fine horse from J. M. Long and sold it in Kokomo. His arrest followed and he is now in the State prison. When the new warden, Mr. Harley, took charge of the prison, he identified Grant and took him from the bicycle factory into the office. Warden Harley was in Muncie the other day and made the facts public.

WORK OF CONGRESS.

THE WEEK'S DOINGS IN SENATE AND HOUSE.

A Comprehensive Digest of the Proceedings in the Legislative Chambers at Washington—Matters that Concern the People.

Lawmakers at Labor.

The first presidential veto of this session of Congress was overridden by the House Saturday by a vote of 198 to 88, 122 more than the requisite constitutional two-thirds. The bill authorizes the Governor and local officers of Arizona to lease the educational lands of the territory for school purposes. The President's objection to the bill was that it did not give the Secretary of the Interior power to disapprove the leases, and did not throw proper safeguards about the timber on the lands. The remainder of the day was consumed in the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill. The Senate concurred in the action of the House in passing the Arizona land bill.

The Senate Monday passed a bill for the increase of the naby, by the addition of 1,000 enlisted men, the enlisting for not more than two years of the naval militia forces in case of emergency, and the chartering of transport ships in case of emergency. The House suspended rules, and by a vote of 263 to 17 adopted its own resolutions of recognition of Cuban belligerency.

The Senate Wednesday began the consideration of the Dupont election case from Delaware. Bills were passed for the purchase of sites for public buildings at Hastings and Norfolk, Neb.; pensioning the widow of the late United States Senator Spencer as brigadier general at $75 per month; for a public building at Fergus Falls, Minn., to cost $175,000; to reorganize the customs collection district of Alaska; compensating Elihu Root for assistance to the Attorney General. The House spent the entire day fixing the salaries of United States district attorneys in the amendment to the legislative appropriation bill to abolish the fee system. The law at present fixes the maximum salary from fees at $6,000. In only one case was the recommendation of the Judiciary Committee departed from—the western district of Pennsylvania, where the salary recommended was increased from $3,500 to $4,000. The salaries for the district attorneys were fixed as follows: Illinois, northern, $5,000; southern, $4,000; Indiana, $5,000; Iowa, northern and southern, $4,000; Michigan, eastern, $4,000; western, $3,000; Minnesota, $4,000; Ohio, northern and southern, $4,000; Oklahoma, $5,000; Oregon, $4,000; Wisconsin, eastern, $4,000; western, $3,000.

The House Thursday wrangled for four hours over the salaries of United States marshals and the other features of the amendment to the legislative appropriation bill to abolish the fee system in the cases of United States attorneys and marshals. Salaries of the marshals fixed were identical with those of the district attorneys, fixed Wednesday, except in the following districts: Indiana, $4,500; eastern district of Louisiana, $2,500; Maine, $3,000; Nevada, $2,000; New Jersey, $2,500; northern district of New York, $5,000; southern district of New York, $5,000. Under the fee system both district attorneys and marshals were allowed fees, not to exceed $6,000, and mileage, which, in some cases, swelled the compensation to as high as $8,000 and $10,000. Instead of mileage at the rate of 10 cents per mile each way, the amendment allows attorneys and marshals their actual traveling expenses. It fixed the fees of United States commissioners considerably below the present schedule. The Senate passed the following bills and resolutions: To pay the heirs of the late John Roach $48,853 on the construction of the gunboat Dolphin; to incorporate the supreme council of the thirty-third degree of Scottish rite Masonry for the southern jurisdiction of the United States; establishing an additional land office in Montana. The Senate confirmed the following nominations: Samuel Comfort, of New York, to be consul of the United States at Bombay, India; George S. Wilson, to be postmaster at Malvern, Iowa; Commodore Thomas O. Selfridge, to be a rear admiral in the navy. Also a number of promotions in the army and navy.

The House passed the legislative appropriation bill Friday. Most of the time, however, was consumed in the consideration of the amendment to abolish the fee system in the cases of United States attorneys and marshals. This amendment was perfected and adopted. A bill was passed to abolish the cash payment of pensions, the purpose of which was to protect veterans who squandered or were swindled out of the pensions on quarterly pay days. Mr. Hull asked unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill to relieve Gen. Carlin of liability for $1,180 expended by Capt. J. M. Clyde in the rescue of a party of students who were snowbound in the Bitter Root mountains in 1893. Mr. Wilson objected, saying that the party had deserted a citizen of Idaho and had left him to die. The evening session was devoted to the consideration of private pension bills.

Odd Names.

In the corridors of a Philadelphia hotel a few nights ago a party of men were talking of curious family names. A young man about town told of a family living in Kensington whose surname was Budd. There were three daughters, he said, who were called respectively Rose Budd, Lillie Budd and May Budd. A young man saw this tale and went one better, declaring that what he said was absolutely true. "The funniest of all the curious names I have ever heard," said he, "belongs to a family by the name of 'Cats,' living in 'Buck Jersey,' a tract lying west of Kirkwood, Del. The old gentleman's name is 'Eleven Cats,' the eldest son 'Tom Cats,' the daughter 'Kity Cats,' and I would not state positively, but I think the mother's name is 'Pussy Cats.'"

The Irish Potato.

The Irish potato is a native of Chili and Peru, where, on the slopes of the Andes, the plant still grows wild. It was brought to England either by Sir John Hawkins, in 1565, or by Drake, in 1586, but before these dates it was grown in Spain and Italy, having been brought from America by the Spaniards. Its cultivation was introduced into Ireland by Sir Walter Raleigh, who had large estates in that island and conceived the idea that the plant ought to do well in the moist climate of the Emerald Isle.

Trotting.

A rather unique trotting vehicle has been introduced. It has a single wheel only, and the rider sits over it as on a bicycle. There are no shafts, the backbone or frame being extended forward and arranged to fasten on the middle of the horse's back with a strap arrangement at the sides, this forming part of the patent, to keep it upright, and yet admit of sufficient play for the swerving of the wheel when turning corners and making curves. The wheel is of the bicycle pattern and pneumatic tired.

Spring Medicine

Your blood in Spring is almost certain to be full of impurities—the accumulation of the winter months. Bad ventilation of sleeping rooms, impure air in dwellings, factories and shops, over-eating, heavy, improper foods, failure of the kidneys and liver properly to do extra work thus thrust upon them, are the prime causes of this condition. It is of the utmost importance that you

Purify Your Blood

Now, as when warmer weather comes and the tonic effect of cold, bracing air is gone, your weak, thin, impure blood will not furnish necessary strength. That tired feeling, loss of appetite, will open the way for serious disease, ruined health, or breaking out of humors and impurities. Burke as an Orator.

Burke spoke in monotone, and the splendid orations that are cited as models of English composition were listened to by few auditors. So dull was his delivery that he was called the "Dinner Bell of the House," because when he arose to speak the greater part of the members at once went out.

AN INVITATION.

It Gives Us Pleasure to Publish the following Announcement.

All women suffering from any form of illness peculiar to their sex are requested to communicate promptly with Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. All letters are received, opened, read and answered by women only. A woman can freely talk of her private illness to a woman; thus has been established the eternal confidence between Mrs. Pinkham and the women of America.

This confidence has induced more than 100,000 women to write Mrs. Pinkham for advice during the last few months.

Think what a volume of experience she has to draw from! No physician living ever treated so many cases of female ills, and from this vast experience surely it is more than possible she has gained the very knowledge that will help your case.

She is glad to have you write or call upon her. You will find her a woman full of sympathy, with a great desire to assist those who are sick. If her medicine is not what you need, she will frankly tell you so, and there are nine chances out of ten that she will tell you exactly what to do for relief. She asks nothing in return except your good will, and her advice has relieved thousands.

Surely, any ailing woman, rich or poor, is very foolish if she does not take advantage of this generous offer of assistance.

Never in the history of medicine has the demand for one particular remedy for female diseases equalled that attained by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and never in the history of Mrs. Pinkham's wonderful Compound has the demand for it been so great as it is to-day.

The Greatest Medical Discovery of the Age.

KENNEDY'S MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

DONALD KENNEDY, OF ROXBURY, MASS.,

Has discovered in one of our common pasture weeds a remedy that cures every kind of humor, from the worst Scrofula down to a common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both thunder humor). He has now in his possession over two hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston. Send postal card for book.

A benefit is always experienced from the first bottle, and a perfect cure is warranted when the right quantity is taken.

When the lungs are affected it causes shooting pains, like needles passing through them; the same with the Liver or Bowels. This is caused by the ducts being stopped, and always disappears in a week after taking it. Read the label.

If the stomach is foul or bilious it will cause squeamish feelings at first.

No change of diet ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it. Dose, one tablespoonful in water at bedtime. Sold by all Druggists.

NOTES ON EDUCATION.

MATTERS OF INTEREST TO PUPIL AND TEACHER.

The More Prominent Duties of the Superintendent as Outlined by A. W. Edson of the Massachusetts Board of Education.

Duties of a Superintendent.

The duties of a superintendent may be classed as general and professional. His more prominent general duties are to inspect the school premises—the grounds, buildings and outhouses; to know and as far as possible to introduce the most approved methods of heating, lighting and ventilating school buildings; to select text and reference books, apparatus and supplies, and to see to their distribution; and, in brief, to attend to the endless details accompanying the business part of the school administration. From an economical standpoint the superintendent often proves himself a profitable agent, saving a town, city, or district in a single year no small part of his salary, and sometimes more than his salary. If prepared for his work, the superintendent is a thorough student of the science and art of education, of psychology with special reference to child study, of applied pedagogy and of the aims and work of our great educational reformers. He has had large and successful experience in teaching, especially in elementary grades. He has an intimate acquaintance with the best schools of the day; he attends educational conventions, institutes, and summer schools; in short, he keeps abreast of all advanced educational movements. Only by such preparation is he fitted to arrange a course of study for his schools. This keystone to any educational structure should be the work of a scholarly and progressive educator. It should indicate the principles underlying, the ends to be attained, the subjects to be taught, the order of their presentation, with some general suggestions on methods of teaching. And after the course of study has been prepared, it must be wisely interpreted and intelligently applied. The further professional duties of a superintendent may perhaps be best shown by a discussion of his relations to four classes of people—the school committee, the teachers, the pupils, and the public:

1. He is the executive head of the school committee. It is the province of the committee to legislate, to give a candid consideration and final decision on the general policy to be pursued. It is the province of the superintendent to study every phase of education, to suggest to the committee what in his judgment he thinks for the best interest of the schools, and, after decision of the committee, to execute their wishes. He keeps the committee well informed on the actual and comparative condition and needs of the schools freely and conscientiously recommending changes where improvements are needed. He is their professional leader, and makes his influence felt on all questions pertaining to the welfare of the schools.

2. The value of skilled supervision rests largely in the ability of the superintendent to select and retain good teachers, and to assist all, both strong and weak, to the best results possible. He secures a list of desirable candidates, examines carefully into their qualifications, corresponds with persons able to speak from personal knowledge of their worth and work, visits them in the school room, and in a variety of ways exercises a judicious care in their selection. He places each teacher where she is most likely to succeed, visits her often, suggests good methods and encourages her in every way in his power. He is a strength and inspiration to the entire teaching force. Superior teachers are recognized and upheld, mediocre ones are stimulated to better preparation and greater efforts, while those who have no ability, who are hopelessly poor, are soon crowded out of the service. Many of our best teachers refuse to teach in towns having no superintendent—they recognize the value of the help he is able to render.

In the school room the superintendent follows closely the work of each teacher, notes mistakes, omissions, and weaknesses, and give occasional test and teaching exercises. This constant contact with the schools enables the superintendent to understand and appreciate the difficulties of teachers far better than can any amount of reading and theorizing. Even a brief visit enables a superintendent to observe the spirit and order of the school and the value of the teaching.

The superintendent confers frequently with his teachers at general or grade meetings. Here he unifies and strengthens effort, compares the work of teachers in the same grade and of several grades, considers with them the ends and means in all school exercises, presents model lessons, interprets the various steps in the course of study, encourages and directs professional reading and study. Teachers' meetings without a superintendent to direct are rare and of little value.

3. The superinrendent sees that the schools are provided with everything necessary to the bodily health and comfort of pupils, as well as with every appliance for their instruction. He assists in examining, classifying, and promoting pupils from time to time, and by his discriminating oversight prevents the machinery of school organization from destroying all individuality. Proper gradation and frequent promotions lead pupils to be prompt and regular at school, and to this end sees that the truant officers do their duty. He excites the ambition of pupils to obtain a good education, and as a result the attendance in grammar and high schools is greatly increased.

4. The superintendent often renders the schools invaluable service by interesting the people, the fathers and mothers, taxpayers and voters, in their present condition and needed improvements. He gains their attention and support by frequent teachers' meetings, where all interested can learn of what is being attempted, and of modern education—its purpose, means and methods; by evening meetings for general discussion of the work of the schools and the relations of the people to them; by school exhibitions, where some of the more tangible results of the school work can be displayed; by arranging special visiting days, where the regular daily work of the schools can be observed by providing monthly and yearly reports of pupils' work and progress for the inspection of parents; and by interesting the daily and weekly press in reporting school news and abstracts of addresses at teachers' meetings, institutes and conventions. When people hear much of the schools, visit them often and appreciate their needs, they appropriate liberally for their support.

Again, he often acts the part of intermediary in settling differences and misunderstandings between parents and children on the one hand and teachers on the other. Educational machinery will always work with greater ease and efficiency if the cogs, wheels and bearings are kept well oiled.—The School Journal.

What to Do for Boys.

Much can be done for boys from twelve to sixteen. Physically, we can easily aid them to be lithe, stalwart, strong, enduring, establishing habits of physical care and exercise. Mentally, there should be no overloading, but much exercising. The effort should be to develop quick, reliable, persistent thinking. Habit of the best mental activity is indispensable. If the boy is not bookish, if he has no scholarly tastes, no tendencies for investigation in science, or activity in industry, there is need of great care to discover the line along which he can be lead to think individually and vigorously.

It is more difficult to know what to do with the boy emotionally excitable, impatient and inconsistent. Each child needs treatment specially adapted to himself, and every varying mood needs varying treatment. The will is not to be broken, nor is it to be allowed to run wild. While goodness cannot be whipped into a boy, it is not at all sure that some boys at some times do not need a very firm restraining hand. It is impossible for a mother to weep saintliness into the boy, and yet, rare tears and great occasions may be most efficacious. The rod, the scolding tongue, the weeping mother are not specifics, and yet it is as sure as anything can be that any boy who has no birthmark of fatal moral deformity could be trained, if in the hands of experts, so that he would come of age in a thoroughly balanced, well modulated, emotional life. The great demand of the age is for expert treatment of boys and good sense on the part of the part of parents which shall place especially freakish sons in charge of such experts.

There is little hope of expert home training for the boy who needs exceptional home care and treatment, the only hope is in the teacher who has prepared himself for such effort. The public school teacher cannot expect to be a specialist, and if he is, he has no right to give to one child the time, thought and energy that belongs to fifty. Public sentiment must be toned up until the vicious boy is cared for as specifically as the physically deformed or mentally imbecile.—Columbus School Journal.

Learn to Laugh.

Learn to laugh. A good laugh is better than medicine. Learn how to tell a story. A well-told story is as welcome as a sunbeam in a sick room. Learn how to keep your own troubles to yourself. The world is too busy to care for your ills and sorrows. Learn to stop croaking. If you cannot see any good in the world, keep the bad to youreself. Learn to hide your pains and aches under a pleasant smile. No one cares to hear whether you have the earache, headache or rheumatism. Don't cry. Tears do well enough in novels, but they are out of place in real life. Learn to meet your friends with a smile. The good-humored man or woman is always welcome, but the dyspeptic or hypochondriac is not wanted and may be a nuisance as well.—Exchange.

The Kindergarten Summed Up.

The kindergarten develops the threefold nature of the child. Its object is the formation of character by the means of an harmonious development of body, mind and soul. This is accomplished by means of play, childlike work and constant exercise in right doing. The kindergarten recognizes and seeks to develop the individuality of each child. It furnishes him with the companionship of his equals, through whom he gets his first lesson in citizenship. It affords the best transition from home to school life. It provides the best preparation for school life. It strives to prepare the child not only for time, but for eternity, by enabling him to grow into what he can be and what God meant him to be

A Hint.

The first effort of a teacher with a class of beginners should be to make them feel at home in the school. To this end the children should be encouraged to enter into familiar conversation with the teacher, and with each other, under the direction of the teacher, and the cultivation of habits of intelligent observation and correct expression, is one of the principal aims of the instruction in this grade.—Supt. W. C. Warfield, Covington, Ky.

School Libraries.

Children will read and teachers may do much good by directing them therein. We suggest that as far as possible they arrange to have the State Pupils' Reading Circle books purchased and that additions to the list of suitable books owned by the school be made for the several grades as fast as possible

His Wig in His Pocket.

A correspondent of the Washington Post tells how Benjamin Franklin once wore his wig in his pocket at the court of Versailles. When he was about to present himself at the court for the first time he was informed that a wig was essential. Franklin's head as so large that no ordinary wig would begin to fit it. However, one was found sufficiently large to pass him through the ante-chambers, after which he was permitted to remove the ridiculous conventional appendage and place it in his ample pocket.

St. Cecilia.

St. Cecilia, famous as the patroness of music and musicians, was a noble lady of Rome, who lived in the latter part of the second and the beginning of the third century. Numberless legends are narrated in the "Lives of the Saints" of her musical gifts. She perished during a general persecution of the Christians, but the remembrance of her talents was so persistent that it is said she was one of the earliest saints to have the honor of canonization. Her feast is November 22.

PARALYSIS.

From the Press, New York City.

Morris Preslaner, of No. 1 Pitt street, New York, who is a real estate agent and collector of rents, caught a severe cold early last spring, which settled upon his kidneys. Soon he began to suffer severe pains in his backbone, sides and chest. His symptoms grew rapidly more alarming, until at last he was as helpless as a child and could scarcely move as he lay on his bed. As Mr. Preslaner is well-known in the part of town where he resides, he had many sympathizers, who did all they could to help him.

Though a native of Berlin, Mr. Preslaner has lived in this country for forty years, having served the country of his adoption by three years' hard service in the civil war. He enlisted with the Nineteenth Illinois Infantry, taking part in many battles and marching with Gen. Sherman to the sea. While in Georgia Mr. Preslaner was promoted to first sergeant for bravery on the field of action. He is a member of Koltes Post, G. A. R., and a very popular man in the Post.

Mr. Preslaner told a reporter the story of his dreadful illness and wonderful recovery. The reporter met him as he was returning from a long walk, and, saying that he had heard of his wonderful cure, asked him to tell the story. When Mr. Preslaner was comfortably seated in his pleasant parlor, he told the following story, which, he said, he hoped everyone who was suffering as he had suffered would read. His words were as follows: "To begin with, I was taken sick just a year and a month ago, having taken a severe cold which settled on my kidneys. At first I thought the pain I suffered would soon pass away, but, instead of doing this, it grew more intense every day, so that in a week I could walk only with considerable difficulty.

"I called in a doctor, who said I had locomotor ataxia and began treating me for that disease. He did me no good, and all summer long I could scarcely attend to my business at all. Then I called another doctor and took his medicine for several weeks, but experienced no relief. Dr. Truman Nichols, of No. 287 East Broadway, who I at last called in, helped me more than any of the other doctors, but along towards fall I grew worse, despite his treatment. I think Dr. Nichols is a good doctor and understood my case, but despite this fact his medicines did me no lasting good.

"Early in November the little strength I had in my legs left me and I was unable to stand. The pain in my back and sides became almost unbearable, and my limbs grew cold. An electric battery I bought failed to help me, and for weeks I felt myself growing weaker until all hope left me.

"Some time before this I had read of a wonderful cure a man had received from Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, but was so prejudiced against what I thought was a patent medicine of the usual worthless character that I could not make up my mind to try them. As my pains increased and death seemed coming near, I thought of what I had read and of the symptoms of the man who had been cured. They were precisely the same as mine, and at last, with my wife's earnest entreaty, I consented to try the Pink Pills.

"I am now convinced that these pills saved my life. Gradually my strength began to return, the desire to live grew stronger within me. After having taken three boxes I left my bed. This was early in March. All pain had left me, and that terrible dead feeling in my legs had gone away. I was still very weak, but before I had taken the fourth box I was able to get down stairs for a short walk in the open air. Every pleasant day I take a walk, and am sure that in a month I will be as well as ever."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills contain all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are for sale by all druggists, or may be had by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y., for 50c per box, or six boxes for $2.50.

He Was Careful.

"I hope, Mr. Clover, that you have seen to it that your cows haven't tuberculosis," said a lady to her milkman.

"And what may that be, ma'am?"

"Why, it is a disease, and the germs of it get into the milk."

"Lor', ma'am, I hope you don't think as I'd be guilty o' fetchin' you milk without first strainin' of it, ma'am!"

Liable to Military Service.

$100 Reward, $100.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of Testimonials.

RIPANS TABULES

A gentleman of a methodical habit, who had adopted the practice of retaining a copy of every prescription issued by his family physician, became interested as time went on to note that the same ingredients were pretty certain to be prescribed at some point of the treatment of every case. For a poor appetite, or a sore throat, for restlessness which disturbed the baby's sleep, and for troubles which beset the aged grandparents, the favorite remedy was always turning up, although slightly modified from time to time and used often in conjunction with others. One day our friend happened to observe that the formula of a certain advertised remedy was identical with the latest prescription he had received from his own physician, and in some surprise he stated the case to him. The family doctor, after listening to what he had to say, replied: "The case is about this way: Whenever there is a disturbance of the functions of the body, no matter of what nature, it is pretty certain to be accompanied by a derangement of the digestive organs. When they are all right the patient gets well. That particular formula that you have observed me to write more and more frequently is the result of an age of careful experiment, and is pretty generally agreed upon now by all educated physicians who keep up with the times. The discovery of the past few years of the means of reducing every drug to a powder and compressing the powders into little lozenges or tablets, or tabules if you prefer, which will not break or spoil, or lose their good qualities from age, if protected from air and light, is the explanation of how it has come about that this prescription is now for sale as an advertised remedy. It is the medicine that nine people out of ten need every time they need any, and I have no doubt that making it so easy to obtain, so carefully prepared, and withal so cheap, will tend to actually prolong the average of human life during the present generation."

Ripans Tabules are sold by druggists, or by mail if the price (50 cents a box) is sent to The Ripans Chemical Company, No. 10 Spruce Street, New York. Sample vial, 10 cents.

A UNIQUE OVERCOAT.

It Is Made of the Skins of Unborn Musk Oxen.

S. N. Malterner of Spokane wears an overcoat that is bound to attract attention, no matter where it is seen, says the Spokesman-Review. The coat is made out of fur of the unborn musk ox, and, while not only very rare, is exceedingly pretty. The coat is light in weight and were it not for the weight of the lining would seem as though made of the softest down. The color is a light silver gray when the light is upon it from one direction and as soon as the light is shifted it turns to a clear gray. When seen under a light not very bright it has the appearance of jet black. Mr. Malterner says that it has attracted so much attention in the eastern cities that he had to lay it aside to keep from being bothered answering questions as to what it was and where he got it.

"The fur of the unborn musk ox," said he, "is very rare. In fact, cannot be had for money. The way I got the fur to make this one was peculiar. Two years ago I made a trip to the Great Slave lake and in fitting out at Athabasca Landing I bought a canoe, paying $100 for it. It was along toward fall when I got back to the landing and there I met an old trapper, who had been hunting and trapping along the lakes and rivers for a number of years. He seemed to take quite a fancy to my canoe, although he did not say anything, but was looking it over carefully and noting its good points, as a horse fancier would a blood horse. Finally he stepped up to me and said: 'Say, mister, what are you going to do with that boat?'

"At that time I had no expectations of ever going up in that part of the country again and, as the boat could be of little value to me, I answered, 'Just to show you that the Yankees are all right I'll give you that boat.' He was greatly pleased and, after looking it over again, he said: 'Well, I'll just show you that the old trapper is all right, too,' and, taking me over to his warehouse, he got a number of these furs and gave them to me. At a cash value they would be worth many times the canoe and they were his accumulation for a number of years.

"After making the coat I found that I only lacked two of having enough to make a jacket for my sister, and when I went on my trip down the Mackenzie this year I met the trapper again and told him that I would like to get three more. He loaned me the canoe that I had given him the year before, and when I returned to the landing in the fall he had three furs for me."

She Never Told Her Age.

It was the busy season at a great bank. Long rows of women, some anxious and depressed-looking, all of them with an unmistakable air of weariness, were waiting their turn with books to be presented for the semi-annual interest. A pompous and many-buttoned official paced back and forth with a look of determination to keep order or die on his grim visage. The woman at the window was a new depositor, and there was a longer wait than usual, while she answered all the questions relative to her genealogy and that of her sisters and her cousins and her aunts—information which one must always give to a great bank before it will condescend to receive, and sometimes lose, your money.

At last came the fateful question: "What is your age?"

A faint blush stole over the faded cheeks, the antiquated and corkscrew curls quivered with agitation, as she murmured, "I'd rather not tell, please."

The bank clerk meant business. He had no sympathy with the maiden modesty of the trembling aspirant to financial dignity. "O, but you must tell," he replied, somewhat brusquely.

The blushes grew painful, but there was still a loophole of escape. At least all the world should not know her age, and, raising herself on tiptoe so as to bring her face close to the window—for she was short of stature—she said: "May I whisper it, please?" And the woman behind will never know how old she was.

Congressional Convention

The republican congressional convention is to be held in Auburn on Thursday March 19. Mr. Leighty will no doubt be nominated for the second, term, that being the custom with both parties. We presume he has made a good member, as far as anyone could in a congress that has evidently determined to do nothing but draw salary and quarrel about free silver. The meeting here on March 19, will also select delegates and alternates to the national convention to be held at St. Louis. There are other district places to fill, which will be done that day. This will make it the most notable convention we shall have at Auburn this campaign probably.

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

It's a labor-saver—a woman-saver. Without the long and wearying peeling, chopping, boiling, seeding and mixing, a woman can quickly make mince pie, fruit pudding, or fruit cake that will be the delight of her household. Since None Such is sold everywhere there is no more need of making your own mince meat than of making your own yeast.

Try one package—10 cents. Take no substitutes.

MERRELL-SOULE CO., Syracuse, N. Y.

Court.

Court has been doing considerable work, mostly preliminary and preparatory. But it adjourned Tuesday evening and Judge Penfield went to Lagrange to hold court for them. We note the following work done:

Sargent Ocker et al, vs. Prouty Davis et al to declare a judgment not a lien. Prouty was found to be a non-resident and a publication was ordered.

Sarah Weygandt vs George G. Weygandt ordered off docket. And the same entry was made in the case of Lillie Gonser vs John Kempf, till it should be redocketed.

Matt Elliott vs Groscop, was dismissed.

In case of Geo. McIntosh vs Sarah McIntosh for partition, the commissioner makes report of sale and same is confirmed.

Barbara Rosenberry vs L. S. Ry. Co. for damages, came up, and defendant asked change of venue from the county and circuit, which was allowed and the case went to Noble county, with 20 days to perfect the necessary papers.

The case of B. F. Kennedy vs Dora Anthony, note, was dismissed.

Mason vs Childs et al, note, finding of $301 against Geo. Childs which is secured by mortgage on the premises described; finding of $252 for Anna Sawyer on a cross complaint.

Jay McIntosh vs S. J. Tarney, dismissed for failure to file bond.

McCormick vs Wabash Ry. damages called up, and general denial by defendant, entered.

Fisher vs Grate, note, dismissed.

Pence vs Rodgers et al, received J. P. Crimmins, asks leave to sell on terms named, which is granted. Baxter & Brown have the plaintiff's interest in charge and Rose & Rose are for defendant.

Zonker vs Nickey and Blucher, has been called up and several motions entered, but nothing definite done so far.

Bertha Zeigler vs Nancy Smith, damages, L. J. Blair appears for defense and McDonald for plaintiff. General denial entered.

Chas. Swift, treasurer of Adrian College sues Harvey A. Clark and others on a mortgage. Finding for plaintiff $2290, while Clark is on a cross complaint allowed $2186.

Harper vs Klotz for partition. Amended complaint is filed making Ora and Lee Hosack defendant parties. W. H. Leas appears for Klotz and Phillips is for plaintiff.

Mary J. Hoyles is divorced from Albert W. Hoyles and given custody of their child, Harry.

Anna Oppenheimer vs Jackson township sues on township order, Defendant files motion to strike out parts of complaint. Plaintiff files demurrer to each of defendant's answers except first and second. Baxter & Brown are for plaintiff and Rose for defendant.

Union Central Life vs Treesh, note, plaintiff gets $86.

W. S. Dancer trustee, of Jackson township, vs J. J. Walters, has been been called up. Judge McClellan, for defendant appears, and asks to have complaint made more specific. Sustained. Rose & Rose, and Worden and Zollars represent the plaintiff.

Case of Bogart vs Bicknell, on note, is continued.

Victor F. Lawson, by Rose & Rose, attorneys, sues T. E. McCullough and A. D. Lane on account. A. J. Baxter appears for Lane, and asks to have case stricken from docket.

E. Case vs Lewis Brown, note judgment for $12.

Evans Dermott, guardian for John Lumbarger, sues to have deed set aside Judge Penfield having been counsel in the case, before his election, gives it over Judge Adair.

Driver vs Nickey, on warranty, has been called up. McClellan, Garwood & McClellan are for plaintiff and Hartman for defense. General denial filed.

Emma D. Miller vs Geo. Strayer for damage, appears by Rose & Rose, while Hartman is for defense.

Jacob Werntz vs Geo. Scattergood injunction case, Hartman & Hartman are for plaintiff and McDonald & Shuman for defendant. Several demurrers and answers filed.

Wm. S. Sewell was admitted to the bar to practice as an attorney.

Frank Emans asks a divorce from Martha Emans. He got it.

The grand jury has gone out to visit the poor farm to-day, and that finishes their work, so they can go home this evening.

Prosecutor Davis was here to-day to see how their work came on, but return Monday to report to the judge who is now absent.

PROBATE DOCKET.

Among the items in this line we note these:

Jas. Buchanan and Amina Squires, petition for removal of Albert Buchanan, guardian of Emily Buchanan, non comp. Said guardian tendered his resignation, which is accepted on settlement with his successor.

Report of J. E. Thompson, guardian of the Benjamin heirs, was examined and accepted.

Bond of Alice W. Booth, guardian of Edith Cooke heirs, was approved with H. P. Stron and Samuel Gfeller as sureties.

Report of Wm. Goodwin guardian of Henry Goodwin, non comp., approved.

Daniel Kimmel's bond of $3000 as guardian for the John Green heirs approved, with John W. Smathers and Edwin Mortorff securities.

Geo. W. Kirkpatrick filed additional bond, as guardian of Bertha Kirkpatrick.

G. W. Layman, guardian of Mary Lehman, bond approved,

A. L. Lake, guardian of Sarah Lake made final report and was discharged.

Stephen Surface, for Christopher Miller, report examined, and he was continued two years.

Bond of Lillie Curran approved, as guardian of Dick McMany.

Petronella Queer, guardian of Anthony Queer, was discharged and guardianship transferred to Noble county.

Bonds of Adam Deetz guardian for the Israel Ringler heirs, was approved as was the same for Susan Frederick for Nellie Ringler, heir of Chancy Ringler.

Frank Shimer's report as guardian for Alma Shimer, was approved.

Owen Hensinger guardian of Edward Smead heirs, was cited to make a final report.

Samuel Teeters, guardian for Isaac Teeters, made report which was approved.

Bond of Elizabeth Lochamier guardian of Bertha, heir of Oliver P. Waterman, was approved.

ESTATE ADJUSTMENTS.

Daniel McClellan, administrator of the estate of Mary Curry, reports sale of land. Deed approved.

The case between John Beams administrator of the N. Benninghoff estate on claim of Mary E. Smith for $200 was settled.

Pearl Feagler is still in the hands of the sheriff, charged with assault and battery with intent to kill. The trial is put off till he is ready to face the music.

The grand jury had but two changes we believe and that was by E. C. Krontz of Wilmington taking the place of Ed. Berry who is a teacher and could not come, and Amos Rothgeb who took the place of A. P. Foltz, who is also a teacher. P. P. Lochner of Jackson was made foreman of the grand jury and did his work well. The membership of the grand jury as made up, was: P. P. Lochner, E. C. Krontz, Henry Neidig, Wm. Simanton, Amos Rothgeb and Daniel McClellan.

An Old Relic.

Friday's Daily.

I. M. Johnson of this place brought the COURIER Editor an "old relic" to day. It was a license to teach, issued by the writer, Feb. 10, 1872, a little over twenty-four years ago. The license blank was printed in two colors and was done at the Air Line office in Waterloo, now the Auburn COURIER. It is a neat job and good enough for anyone to use, if we did do the work ourself. It was however, made some months before we entered on the office. We presume there are many other such old relics in the county.

More Relics.

S. U. Tarney, is also the possessor of some very interesting relics of the ancient times. Among them are a half dozen of the old-time "reward of merit" picture cards used to encourage pupils in certain studies. These were given him in 1851 by his teacher Charlotte Bailey. And Mrs. Bailey is still alive, her home being in Ft. Wayne. He also has a teacher's certificate given him Nov. 22, 1857, by W. C. McGonigal. It says it was granted at a "private examination," a thing that would be illegal now, but was the usual way at that time. He has another given him by James W. Case, now at Otis, Mass. It is dated in Nov. 1859. But as interesting an article as he has is an old fife, which was used in the war of 1812, by a man named Morr. It is as good as ever, and though a little worn, is a splendid instrument yet. It is of apple tree wood with plain brass ferules at the ends. Mr. Tarney also has a Ray's arithmetic, bought in 1848. As we remarked in a recent note, the town is full of old keepsakes. But Jack Ralston has a relic, the like of which he defies the whole world to produce. It is the old table or "case" knife, which old Mrs. Knapp used in her attempt to commit suicide, while in jail accused of the murder of her husband. It is a strange case that she did not die, though a piece of her bowels was cut out.

Poor Business.

M. D. Yontz, Burford's traveling man was here this week looking up the county printing for his house. There is surely something wrong when county officers turn the cold shoulder on the men who helped to elect them, and give the printing to outside parties at a higher figure than would get the same work done at home. For ten or twelve years, this has been going on, from bad to worse and no one seems able or willing to stop it. Both democratic and republican officers do the same way and the big printing bills are chargeable alike to both. It is a wrong to the taxpayers and to the home printers who would gladly do the work at the same price, or perhaps in many cases, for less.

New Enterprise.

M. A. and W. M. Miller have leased the boiler room of the Auburn Foundry & Machine Works and a now will manufacture boiler tanks, breechen, stacks and all kinds of sheet iron work.

The new firm will be known as the Auburn Practical Boiler Works. These gentlemen are both experienced boiler makers and we feel confident that they will make a success of their new undertaking. They will pay special attention to all kinds of repair work and will make the prices on all work very reasonable. Auburn is gradually adding new enterprises and the Auburn Practical Boiler Works should receive the proper encouragement.

Alfalfa Without Irrigation

Newspaper Bulletin No. 21, from Purdue University Agricultural Experiment Station.

BY W. C. LATTA

The recent abnormally dry seasons have caused a partial or almost a complete failure of clover and other hay crops in many sections. As a result there is an unusual inquiry about pasture and forage plants that promise more certain "catch" than clover, and are better able to endure drouth than the common clovers and grasses. Very naturally attention has been turned to alfalfa and kaffir corn, plants adapted to dry irrigated regions. Alfalfa is preferred by many, as it produces as hay equal to clover and has a similar good effect on the soil. Although alfalfa can, when well started, endure drouth better than clover, it cannot produce three or more crops the same season without irrigation.

Alfalfa has been grown at the Indiana experiment station for several years. As a result of trial, we find:—

1. That alfalfa is more feeble than clover at the start, and is very liable to be choked by weeds the first season.

2. That it increases in vigor until the third year at least, and thus maintains itself better and longer in the soil than common red, mammoth or alsike clover.

3. That in very dry seasons—like 1894—it may yield more hay than clover.

4. That in normal seasons it some times yields less than clover.

5. That but two cuttings of alfalfa may be expected the same season without irrigation.

In any fertile soil, having a sufficiently porous sub-soil, to permit it to send its roots into the lower, permanently moist earth, the alfalfa will probably do well. It is said to do best in light, calcareous loams, underlaid with a porous subsoil. The land should be thoroughly and deeply drained, and if the subsoil is at all compact, it may be plowed to advantage. Subsoil in the fall, but sow the seed in the spring.

Select ground as free as possible from weed seeds and thoroughly prepare the seed bed early in the spring as the ground will bear working well. If manured, a word it should be enriched before or at the time of seeding. Commercial fertilizers supplying lime, phosphoric acid and potash are best at first, but farm manure may be used as a top dressing after the first year.

Sow seed in shallow drills (15 to 20 pounds) or broadcast (20 to 25 pounds) per acre. If broadcast, harrow the seed in well. Heavily roll the ground to insure prompt and even germination. If necessary, mow the weeds with machine so as to admit light and air to the tender alfalfa plants and rake off the clippings if heavy. Do not harvest a crop the first season, unless the growth is very heavy, and even then do not cut late. Mow when in bloom and cure the same as clover.

Close pasturing by any class of stock is injurious to alfalfa, and sheep should not be allowed upon it, but if not grazed too close, it will endure pasturing fairly well. It is, however, best for hay.

Epilepsy 20 Years.

Cured by Dr. Miles' Nervine.

A few years ago, Mr. L. W. Gallaher, was an extensive, successful expert manufacturer of lumber products. Attacked with epilepsy, he was obliged to give up his business. The attacks came upon him most inopportunely. One time falling from a carriage, at another down stairs, and often in the street. Once he fell down a shaft in the mill, his injuries nearly proving fatal. Mr. Gallaher writes from Milwaukee, Feb. 16, '95.

"There are none more miserable than epileptics. For 20 years I suffered with epileptic fits, having as high as five in one night. I tried any number of physicians, paying to one alone, a fee of $500.00 and have done little for years but search for something to help me, and have taken all the leading remedies, but received no benefit. A year ago my son, Chas. S. Gallaher, druggist at 191 Reed St., Milwaukee, gave me Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine, and I tried it, with gratifying results. Have had but two fits since I began taking it. I am better now in every way than I have been in 20 years."

Not to be Trifled With.

(From Cincinnata Gazette.)

Will people never learn that a "cold" is an accident to be dreaded, and that when it occurs treatment should be promptly applied? There is no knowing where the trouble will end; and while complete recovery is the rule, the exceptions are terribly frequent, and thousands upon thousands of fatal illnesses are traced every year directly by a little injudicious exposure and seemingly trifling symptoms. Beyond this, there are to-day countless invalids who can trace their complaints to "colds," which at the time of occurrence gave no concern, and were therefore neglected.—When troubled with a cold use Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It is prompt and effectual. 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by F. E. Davenport.

The Stabbing.

Fred Brooks on Trial for Attempt to Kill Wm. Lower.

Saturday's Daily.

At nine o'clock this forenoon, Prosecutor Davis, began examining the jury to see if any were not eligible. It was a surprise to many, to learn that several jurors had not read a thing about the affray in the papers. They ought to take, at least the COURIER.

Only one or two changes were made, Mr. Kalb going off and Mr. Fildes taking his place. The witnesses on both sides were sworn and then ordered to stay out of the court room till needed.

The defendant, Fred Brooks, and the prosecuting witness, Wm. Lower, wrre both present. Davis, Welsheimer and Phillips were for the State, and Roby and Link for the defense.

The first witness was Lower, himself. He is nineteen years old and lives with his father, A. Lower. In substance, and omitting "objections" and "overrulings," he said that on Jan. 21, he had been at a school house about a mile from his home, as they were going to organize a literary. As he was returning about 8:30 he met some people, two ladies, whom he recognized, but did not recognize a man who was coming up a little ways behind them. But as he passed the man, he was attacked, knocked down by a blow over the right eye, but did not say a word, was also kicked and stabbed. He got away and went home. His parents had gone to bed. He called them up and his father washed his face. The father then went to Shellhouse's to get some one to go for a doctor. The mother got up and examined his hurts. He took off his coat and it was found that he had two slits in it at the back, the knife having gone through his clothing, and made two small wounds in the back which must have bled freely, judging by the appearance of the clothes, that were afterwards shown to the jury. He was also cut or bruised on the ear and chin. When he was attacked he recognized that it was Fred Brooks, though before the attack he supposed it was Marion Goodrich.

This was the substance of the trouble at that time, as he told it. Then he was asked as to any previous trouble and he said that last August, as they were thrashing at Henry Shellhouse's, he and Brooks were working together on the stack, pitching sheaves when Brooks threw some eggs, at the men who were stacking straw, hitting Zack Row. Row tried to find out who threw the eggs and finally Ben Kline told him it was Brooks. Afterward, Lower admitted it was Brooks, and Brooks called him a liar. Lower repeated it and then Brooks took a club and struck Lower across the back of the neck, knocking him over. He also threatened to kill Lower. But Zack Row interfered and the trouble was stopped. This it seems was the first cause of the ill feeling, but they appeared not to have met again till January, at the time of the stabbing.

At the conclusion of his testimony he was directed to show the jury the scars on his chin and ears. The bloody clothing was then shown to the jury. There were two slits in the sack coat, on the back near the waist and rather on the left side. There were holes also in the vest which also showed some blood stains. The shirt was considerable stained and mussed, with a large splash or soaked place of blood, and the woolen undershirt was still worse and there were some blood stains on the inside back of the pants near the top. The lady who had remained near Brooks his, mother or some relative we presume, looked pained at the these grewsome evidences of Brooks' attempted crime. After this Lower was directed to show the cuts on his back. The judge allowed him and the jury and the defendant and both sets of attorneys to into the jury room and examine these scars but not to say anything or do anything more than to look at any examine them:

Here Mr. Roby began the cross examination.

After finishing with Lower in the forenoon, Dr. M. Bowen, who had dressed the wounds, was put on the stand. He said the one stab in the back was probably an inch or two deep. It was found that the other stab was not deep.

AFTERNOON.

Examination of Dr. M. Bowen was continued. The stab was under the "left transverse processes of the lumbar vertebra," and that muscles were there. Cross-examined by Link: I called on Lower once after that. Did not think it necessary to come again. Do not know what the wound was made with. Re-direct: He did not think it if would be necessary to come again as he had given instructions as to care of the hurts.

A. Lower called, examined by Welsheimer. Am father of Wm. Lower. Stated to injuries of Williams, a black eye, chin and ears injured, and later found the hurts on back. William had been to literary and returned at half past ten. Left eye was black, hole in chin was bleeding. Saw clothing was cut. Took them off and saw two wounds. Outside shirt showed two wounds, undershirt showed one. Seemed in pain in back. Was confined to his bed about two weeks, and staid in the house about ten days longer. William changed his pants and left everything in them. So did not have a knife.

Dross-examined by Roby: I was at Hudson that day and William came home at noon from school. I knew the pants had not been emptied, as I saw them that evening while my wife was mending them. Saw the knife and think I would know it if I saw it. Lamp was burning when William came home, called his mother, and I also got up. Don't remember that his wife examined the wound before or after he started off to get a doctor. Took no club along. (Here the attorney and witness had a spat over which had the weakest voice, each claiming he could not hear the other.) Witness thinks he did not state to Welsheimer on direct-examination that William staid in bed two weeks and in the house ten days longer. Thinks he staid in bed ten days. Two marks of stairs were found. Cuts on clothes were a little ways apart, but not nearer together.

Mrs. Lida Goodrich, called. Live east of Lowers. I and Mrs. Metzger and her daughter and Mr. Brooks, met Willie Lower, between our home and Mr. Lower's, knew him by his voice, as he was hallowing to some other boys. Brooks walking ahead of us. Brooks told us to step on ahead, as he was going to have some fun. We went on, and I suppose Brooks was coming on behind us. We soon met Lower and he passed on the south side of us. I heard a blow behind us and looked back, and saw Lower lying on the ground and Brooks kicking him.—By Judge: "Did you hear any words?" "No." Lower asked Brooks what he did that for. Brooks said he wanted Lower to take back what he had said about him. We walked on. After we had gone about a quarter of a mile, we looked back and saw Brooks coming. When we got to corner, he called us to wait for him, and we went on. But he called again, swore at her for not waiting for him. He came up and said he had fixed Lower. He showed his hand, where he said Lower had stabbed him. Have heard Brooks say he was going to whip Lower when he had a chance. This was Sunday evening before the fight. Had heard him talk this way several times. Cross-examination by Roby. Brooks claimed that Lower kept running on him, and had done so a number of times. Was on friendly terms with Lower. Lower though Brooks was my husband.

Marion Goodrich called. Examined by Davis. Brooks had told him, he wanted a dagger as he had enemies. Cross-examined by Roby. Was it not Lower who wanted the dagger? Not that I recollect. Lower and I had talked together, but not about any troubl. Wm. Lower never said in my presence, that if he had got into a fight he, Lower, would use a knife. Brooks said he would lick Lower if he got him alone. Said so several times. But I advised him not to have trouble. I told this to Lower to put him on his grand. Did not tell Brooks to give Lower a good one when he got at him. He and Brooks had been at Corunna together and Brooks looked at a revolver in a hardware store.

Charles Shellhouse called. Live eight miles northwest of here. Heard of the trouble at the threshing in August. Had several talks with Brooks. He said Lower had been lying on him and he must stop or he would "fix him."

Cross-examined by Roby. I think their first trouble was about some traps (repeated what he had said in direct examination).

Jacob Henney called. Live in Fairfield. Know both Brooks and Lower. Saw Fred Brooks one day when he was plowing. He spoke of Lower and said if he ever got at Lower again he would kill him. I told Lower about this about two weeks ago. Did not think much about the threats at the time, but since this has happened I recalled it. I often met Lower (Was not allowed to say whether he was "one of the gang" who guyed Brooks as he left church with his girl).

Zachariah Row called August 15, '95, I was threshing at Shellshouse's. Saw Brooks and Lower there, saw them after dinner, in front of the barn. I worked on straw stack. Right after dinner Brooks and Lower had the trouble. Saw them jangling with one another, Brooks went for Lower, and hit him across the neck with a piece of wood and knocked him down and said he would kill him. Cross examined by Roby, "You did not see the beginning of this row," (Laughter) I did not see the first part of the quarrel. Brooks picked it up at the wood pile near the thresher. Did not see Lower make any show of fighting, did not see Lower strike Brooks. S. H. Melvin called examined by Welsheimer. Have a slight acquaintance with both Brooks and Lower. Edward Brooks said, some time in September, that "If they had let me alone, I would have killed him." He referred to the trouble at Shellhouse's at the barn. I was threshing at Albert Buchanan. Someone was joking Brooks, and he said this by way of vindicating himself.

Adjourned till Monday at 9 a.m.

MONDAY MORNING.

Work could not begin this morning at nine as it usually does, as Prosecutor Davis and one of the attorneys for the defense, Mr. Roby, could not come down from Angola till the 10 a. m. train. on their arrival the court resumed business where it had left off Saturday.

Marion DeLong Sworn, live in Fairtownship. Knows Fred Brooks and Wm. Lower. Saw Brooks at the threashing at Shellhouse's. Did not hear Brooks mention names, but he swore he would kill someone. It began with apple throwing. Lower was in mow. Don't know who hit him. Cross-Examine, Brook was helping me measure up. I was not throwing apples. Brooks threw four or five first then he was hit by someone. (This part of testimony was thrown out on motion of prosecutor.) Here the prosecution "rested," and put on no more witnesses.

THE DEFENSE.

Roby for the defense, then stated to the jury what he expected to prove on Brooks' side. He said he would bring evidenced to show that it was Lower, and not Brooks, who was the aggressor and that Lower had made treats and that when they met in the road that night, Lower began the fight but get the worst of it, and that Brooks having a felon on his hand and in using that hand in warding off blows, in some way got blood onto Lower's clothes, but did not stab him, and that after the fight was over Brooks went on about his business.

Mrs. George Metzger sworn; live in Fairfield township, Fred Brooks is my husband's nephw. Have known him 17 years, he has lived here two years, with us. Brooks home is in Cleveland Worked on farm, he was 20 last October Am acquainted with Marion Goodrich. He lives about a mile from us. He was at our house Saturday evening before, at about 9. Brooks and the family were there. Goodrich said Lower had threatened he would "knife" Brooks if they even got into a fight. Goodrich told Brooks he would not take the threats of Lower and Goodrich warned Brooks to look out. (Last two sentences struck out.) Goodrich said Lower was going to use his knife on him if Brooks ever should go for him.

We were coming home from church at Pleasant Hill, the evening to the fight. My daughter and Mrs. Goodrich were with me. Met Lower in the road.

Lower and those with him were talking loud, Brooks was with behind us. Lower made a peculiar noise with his mouth as he passed, like clearing his throat. Brooks said, "Take that back." Lower made no answer. We heard a blow, but don't know who struck. We went on, Lower had got past us when we heard blow. We did not look back. Saw something glitter in Lower's hand but don't know what it was. Brooks showed me his right hand, but it was the left hand that was hurt, (in palm). Showed hand when he overtook us about 25 rods further on. He said the d——d fool cut me in the hand. At church one time, saw Lower outside when Brooks was taking a girl home. Testimony showing trouble on other occasions between the two men, in the way of insulting talk was partly ruled out.

Witness was sent out, and Lower called again to stand, examined by Roby. When Brooks drove away I saw him and said "his old horse and bone felon". Saw Brooks' horse shy (This statement by Lower as to his trouble some time before, had come up in Mrs. Metzger's testimony)

Mrs. Metzger recalled. She said that Brooks owned an old pen knife. When I was getting supper, I saw his knife in our cupboard. He had left it on the table, and I put it in the cupboard. Don't know whether it was there when I started to church or not. It was there when I got back.

Cross examined by Phillips. My maiden name is Catherine Stroh. Fight was Tuesday evening. When asked if she ever made a statement that she would pay half of Brooks' fine, if he was arrested, she said "No." Brooks was arrested at her house. Did not tell Mrs. Goodrich, that Lower had a knife in his hand that time. Did not tell Mrs. Goodrich, that she and I must help get Brooks out and she would get a new dress, and our people would never forget her. Did not know that Brooks had a knife that night.

Clara Metzger called. Am a daughter of Mrs. Metzger.

Her testimony did not differ from that of her mother, except that she knew the knife was left at home as she used it to open a bottle having medicine in it.

Her two sisters, Sylvia aged 11, and Agnes, aged 9, told about the same story.

AFTERNOON.

Mrs. Metzger was recalled by the state but nothing new was learned, except that about a week after the fight she saw Lower, who seemed to have a gun with him.

Fred. Brooks, the defendant, was then put on stand. Lives with his uncle, Metzger. Saw Lower at Waterloo fair. Saw him in my buggy. (Questioned by Judge, "Do you expect to show Lower was the aggressor?" As defense did not give a satisfactory answer, this was stopped.) Am 20 last October. Jan. 21 had been at church. Went with Mrs. Metzger and her daughter and Mrs. Goodrich. Mrs. Metzger went with me to take Mrs. Goodrich home. Met Lower about half mile east. I knew it was Lower, they were yelling to each other, I was behind the women about two steps. Lower threw an insult, struck me made a noise as in clearing his throat I told him to take that back. He said he did not have to. He struck me, I struck him, then tripped him with my foot and he fell on his back. He said nothing, I struck him when he was on his knees. I lifted him up and asked him if he would take it back. He said he would. Then he called me a son-of-a-b——h and said I will fix you. I did not use a knife, had no knife. Had a felon on my right thumb. I struck him with my left hand.

Primary Election.

At the democratic city caucus a year ago a motion was made by W. B. Brown that at the next caucus for nominating town officers. the nominations should be made by holding a primary election. The understanding was, that this primary election should be held under the Australian system, the same as a regular election. The motion was adopted, and we suppose therefore, that it will be so held this spring. As the time for holding it is now drawing near, we call attention to it, so as to give ample time to study it over.

In this connection, we presume, there are some who have not thought over the subject, and do not know how the details of a primary election of this kind are carried out.

In those counties that use this plan, it is done about like this: The committeemen usually, (though sometimes other voters do this,) select the inspector judges and clerks of the board, and the sheriffs, etc, if they choose to have any, and then the board is organized as usual at elections. The booths are put up and used as at other times. The ballots are printed on slips of paper, and contain, 1. All the names of candidates for trustee of the First ward; 2. All the names of candidates for trustee of the Third ward, then names of all candidates for trustee of the Fourth ward. Then all names of candidates for marshal, then those for clerk, then those for treasurer. The voter takes his ticket from the board, as usual, and enters the booth. Then he stamps opposite the name of the candidate he prefers for trustee of the Frst ward, then in the Third ward, then the Fourth, then in the list for marshals and so on. He gives this ballot after folding it, to the board and passes out. At the close, the board counts the ballots, and the man who has the highest number of votes in each list is the nominee. The plan is certainly a fair one. Of course only one ballot is used, that is, in the case under consideration, they will be democratic, and only democrats and those who agree to act with them at the following election, are entitled to vote. If the republicans hold the same sort of primary election, then at theirs, only a republican ticket will be used and none but republicans be allowed to vote. After the board has certified to the nominations, then the official ballots to be used at the election may be made up as usual. It should also be noted, that in the general election this fall, at least, the order of parties, as printed on official ballots, will be changed. The republican ticket will come first and the democratic ticket next to the right, instead of having the democratic ticket first as heretofore.

It might be asked who pays the expense. This is usually borne by the candidates, and is but slight, as the tickets are cheap and few, and the other expenses small. We presume some compensation is allowed the board. The polls open at 2, 3, or 4 o'clock p. m. and close at 6, 7 or 8, as can be agreed on by the committee and the voters. Only one booth will be needed.

They are Here!

We wonder where we will find room for them. Like the street car, "always room for one more;" we are compelled to pile them on top the shelving, under the counter, and it looks like some ill have to go on the roof. No use trying to display them all. Can't do it. If you don't see what your want, don't be bashful; ask for it. We think we have the finest line of general merchandise ever shown in Auburn. and we believe that you will agree with us when you've seen our stock. CASTORIA for Infants and Children.

MOTHERS, Do You Know that Paregoric, Bateman's Drops, Godfrey's Cordial, many so-called Soothing Syrups, and most remedies for children are composed of opium or morphine?

Do You Know that opium and morphine are stupefying narcotic poisons?

Do You Know that in most countries druggists are not permitted to sell narcotics without labeling them poisons?

Do You Know that you should not permit any medicine to be given your child unless you or your physician know of what it is composed?

Do You Know that Castoria is a purely vegetable preparation, and that a list of its ingredients is published with every bottle?

Do You Know that Castoria is the prescription of the famous Dr. Samuel Pitcher. That it has been in use for nearly thirty years, and that more Castoria is now sold than of all other remedies for children combined?

Do You Know that the Patent Office Department of the United States, and of other countries have issued exclusive right to Dr. Pitcher and his assigns to use the word "Castoria" and its formula, and that to imitate them is a state prison offense?

Do You Know that one of the reasons for granting this government protection was because Castoria had been proven to be absolutely harmless?

Do You Know that 35 average doses of Castoria are furnished for 35 cents, or one cent a dose?

Do You Know that when possessed of this perfect preparation, your children may be kept well, and that you may have unbroken rest?

Well, these things are worth knowing. They are facts.

The fac-simile signature of Chas. H. Fletcher is on every wrapper.

THE NEWS RECORD.

SUMMARY OF A WEEK'S HAPPENINGS.

The Latest News as Flashed Over the Wires from All Parts of the World—Regarding Politics, Religion, Casualties, Commerce and Industry.

WHIPPED

Were Nicaraguan Rebels by the Government Troops.

Managua (Nicaragua) special: The Nicaraguan Government troops have won another important victory over the forces of rebellious Leonists, and there is great rejoicing there in consequence.

The battle took place at and about Pital, not far from Momotombo. Between 2,000 and 3,000 men were engaged. The fighting was severe, and the troops from Leon, Chichegalpa, and Chinadega, the three strongholds of the Leonists, numbering about 1,500 men, were completely routed, with the loss of about 100 killed and wounded. Only about fifty of the Government troops, which numbered about 1,200 men, were killed or wounded. The rebels were cammanded by General Ortiz, the commander-in-chief of the Leon forces, but Baca, the rebel President, was at Leon. The Government troops were commanded by Generals Paiz and Bodan. The Government troops are now being concentrated for the advance upon Leon, which it is expected will commence in a few days.

Burned to Death.

The house of John Johnson, of West Charleston, V. Va., burned recently. When the fire was discovered Eunice Johnson was seen lying on the floor of the hall, evidently living. A hook was thrown over her, and she was dragged to the front door, when the rope burned and it was impossible to rescue her. The origin of the fire is unknown. Miss Johnson was the only person in the house at the time. She was subject to fits and had one before falling in the fire.

Danger of Natural Gas.

Early the other morning fire was discovered in the residence of James M. Hall, at Harrisville, W. Va. Imperfect natural gas connection allowed the house to fill with gas, and it ignited. The flames spread rapidly, completely destroying the house and contents. Hall's aged mother was burned to death before assistance could reach her. The store house and stock of goods owned by Hall were also destroyed.

Wrecked by Dynamite.

The residence of George Shaw at Brookfield, Ohio, was wrecked by dynamite and Mrs. Shaw so badly injured that she will die. The woman was putting coal in the stove and innocently threw in the fire a large stick of dynamite which in some mysterious manner got in the coal. Mr. Shaw, who is overseer of the Hamilton stone quarries, thinks that it was a plot of enemies to murder him.

Maceo Breaks Through.

Key West (Fla.) special: A startling report has reached here by passengers on a steamer from Havana. It is that Maceo, the insurgent leader, has broken through the cordon of Spanish troops, almost annihilating one royal regiment, and is now somewhere, near the capital. The report has created great excitement here.

In Boiling Candy.

The 2-year-old child of H. H. Terrell plunged headlong into a skillet of boiling candy at its parents' home in West Liberty Ky., and was fatally burned. The sticky mass clung to the child's tender flesh, imparting a heat that cooked to the bone. The little one is still alive in terrible agony, but can live only a few hours.

Holmes' Lawyer Punished.

Philadelphia special: Lawyer William A. Shoemaker, who was senior counsel for H. H. Holmes, and who was charged with subordination of perjury in connection with that famous case, was, by a decision of the Court of Oyer and Terminer, suspended from the privileges of the Court for one year.

Bath of Boiling Fat.

John Beckley, employed at the packing house of W. R. Jones & Son, Brazil, Ind., was fatally burned by hot grease. The lower man-head of the immense grease vat blew out, covering Beckley with hot grease.

This From Morton's State.

Buffalo (N. Y.) special: The Republican caucus in Erie County resulted in overwhelming success for the McKinley men. The Thirty-third Congressional District McKinley delegates won 100 to 37.

Death of a Noted Indianian.

Col. Thomas H. Nelson, one of the best known public men in Indiana, died in his rooms in McKeen's Block, Terre Haute, Ind., where he has been confined for four weeks.

Masonic Temple Theater, Ft. Wayne, Indiana.

April 9.—Robert Mantell.

A Bloody Deed.

Jacob Marty, aged 52 years, a resident of McPhearson County, South Dakota, dragged his sick wife out of bed and cut her throat, nearly severing her head from her body. He then cut his own throat, both dying immediately. They leave eleven children. Marty was suffering from despondency, caused, it is thought, by extreme poverty.

Child Drowned.

The 3-year-old child of David Unger was drowned in the cistern at his home on the South Side, Wabash, Ind.

State of Trade.

R. G. Dun & Co's. Weekly Review of Trade says: Waiting is the rule. Large hope but little actual business explains the strength of some markets and the weakness of others. The feeling that the spring of 1896 ought to bring larger business will not suffice to meet expenses all the season if larger business does not come. It is especially noteworthy that prices of materials varied quite differently from prices of manufactured products, although in most cases the advance of last fall commenced by extraordinary uplifting of prices for materials.

Failures for the week have been 300 in the United States, against 266 last year and 40 in Canada against 37 last year.

WRECKED.

News of the Loss of the American Sealing Schooner, Mattie T. Dyer.

San Francisco special: The steamer Alameda arrived from Honolulu, bringing the following advices under date of March 9, to the Associated Press: The American sealing schooner, Mattie T. Dyer of San Francisco, was wrecked on the French frigate shoals, 420 miles southwest from Honolulu, February 22. She was twenty days out from San Francisco for the Japan Sea. In a few minutes after striking the reef the vessel filled and sank, giving the crew no chance to get provisions or water. The crew eventually got away in four boats, three boats with six men each, and one with five. The provisions in each boat consisted of six cans of peaches. The captain and first officers of the boat landed on Nyhan with their six men in each boat all alive on February 26. The third boat's crew landed at Mana, a port on Kauna, on the 28th. The fourth was picked up by an island steamer. According to the captain the wreck was due to southwest currents.

A Train Held Up in Illinois.

A dispatch from Salem, Ill., reports the holding up of a fast mail train of the Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern Railroad at that place the other day. When the train approached the crossing, where an interlocking switch is used, the switchman at the tower was unable to give the signal to go ahead and the train stopped. The trainmen went forward to learn the cause of the trouble with the switch, when a man boarded the passenger coach and began to hold up the passengers. The train stopped only a short time and but one man was robbed—L. J. Cowles, a passenger from St. Louis, who was going to Dayton, Tenn. Mr. Cowles says the robber got from $65 to $70 from him. There is no clew to the robber.

Attempted Bank Robbery.

A desperate attempt was the other morning to rob the First National bank at Germantown, Ohio, by the liberal use of giant powder. The robbers, who were evidently not professionals, used so much powder that the bank room was wrecked, the people of the town were aroused and the criminals fled. The door of the vault, weighing 800 pounds, was blown thirty feet. In the vault were $70,000 in cash, besides many securities. The bank officers are puzzled to knowhow the visitors escaped being blown to pieces.

Daring Robbery.

A special from Bowling Green, O., says: A daring robbery was committed in the village of Milton Center recently. The grocery store of L. A. Dicus and Leaming's drug store were entered. The burglars loaded the safes on a hand car, carried them about a mile into the country, where they were dynamited, and nearly $1,000 in cash was secured, besides several gold watches.

Looking After Train Wreckers.

Laporte (Ind.) special: Detectives are working on the recent attempts made to wreck Baltimore and Ohio trains, near Woodville, Porter County, by placing obstructions on the track. Heavy timbers were laid across the rails, and only the vigilance of train crews averted a number of accidents that would probably have sacrificed life and property.

Two Men Lost.

New York special: The schooner, Kate Scranton, owned and captained by Charles Bates, which went ashore about a mile east of the Eaton Neck life saving station, Long Island, went to pieces during the night. Two of the crew were drowned, Mate Oliver Christrieman, a Norwegian, and George Upther, aged 50, a colored man.

Another Defeat for the Italians.

The Rome correspondent of the Central News telegraphs that information has been received by the Italian government that a strong force of Dervishes has made an attack upon Sabdevati, between Kassala and Agordat. The Italian force, being greatly outnumbered, retreated to the hills. The losses of either side are not known.

Justice in Texas.

At Dallas, Texas, the jury in the case of Frank Wallace, who a year ago killed Joe Quarles, a correspondent of the Kansas City Sunday Sun, returned a verdict of not guilty of murder and Wallace was given his liberty. Quarles wrote and had published a scurrilous story about Wallace and the letter stabbed him to death.

Italy Will Fight.

Rome special: The Prime Minister, Marquis Di Rudini, has telegraphed to Gen. Baldiasera, Commander of the Italian army in Abyssinnia, giving him assurance that he will be furnished with all the troops that may be necessary to prosecute the campaign in Africa to a successful issue.

Martial Law Proclaimed.

Tegucigalpa (Honduras) special: The whole republic has been placed under martial law pending settlement of the civil revolt in Nicaragua, in which the president of Honduras has espoused the cause of the Zelaya government against the rebels.

Fell Sixty Feet.

A freight elevator in the saddlery and carriage house of W. S. Bruce & Sons, Memphis, Tenn., fell sixty feet. Four men on it were injured, one fatally.

Hurt in a Runaway.

Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Bragg, prominent citizens of Milton, were seriously injured in a runaway accident in Cambridge City, Ind.

CODES FOR CABLE USE

CIPHERS MUST BE UNIFORM HEREAFTER.

After Jan. 1, 1898, Business Houses Engaged in Foreign Trade Must Conform to the Usage of the International Telegraph Bureau at Berne.

New Telegraph Rule.

On the 1st of January, 1898, the business houses in America that are engaged in foreign trade and employ the cable will be compelled to adopt a single uniform code instead of those at present in use. As is well known, banks, commission houses, mercantile establishments and manufacturers now use groups of arbitrary words in sending their telegrams abroad. Each of these words conveys the meaning of a whole sentence, and not only economizes cost, but preserves the secrecy of dispatches, which cannot be understood by the operators or other persons into whose hands they may fall without the use of a code to translate them.

An international telegraphic bureau at Berne is supported by the various governments who own telegraph and cable lines, and is maintained for the purpose of making uniform rates and rules for international business. Representatives of such governments hold conventions every five years for the purpose of reviewing the work of the bureau and taking such action as is necessary and expedient for their mutual advantage. At the last international conference, which was held in Paris in 1891, it was decided to require all patrons of the cable and telegraph systems in the countries belonging to the union to use an authorized uniform code, which it is proposed to make universal. A commission was appointed to prepare a vocabulary in seven languages—English, French, German, Dutch, Italian, Portuguese and Latin—and their work will be submitted for approval at the next conference, which is to be held at Buda Pest in the coming June. Copies of the proposed vocabulary have been forwarded to the United States for inspection. It is a large volume and contains 250,000 words selected from the languages named and arranged in alphabetical order. While the American cable companies have not accepted the new code, they will be compelled to do so, for the reason that foreign companies will not accept messages in any other cipher after Jan. 1, 1898.

The patrons of the cable are not required to accept the arbitrary meaning of the words given in the official vocabulary, but are allowed to apply them to any sentences or figures or combinations they please. That is, each patron of the cable system may arrange his own private code as at present, but must use the symbols furnished by the international union. Therefore the same message may be sent to a dozen different firms and have a different meaning to every one of them.

This will make it necessary for the Government of the United States to arrange new official ciphers. Those in use at present by the State and Navy Departments are old and cumbersome, and it is believed that several foreign governments have translations of the State Department. United States ministers in Madrid have been amazed at times to discover that the officials of the foreign office there were familiar with the contents of cipher dispatches received from Washington, and when Mr. Trescott's peace commission went to Chili in 1882, they found that the minister of foreign affairs had translations of their instructions from Washington almost as soon as themselves. It has been freely charged that a former minister of the United States at Santiago gave or sold a copy of our code to the Chilian Government. Several times the Secretary of State has proposed to frame a new one, but it has never been accomplished. Among European governments new codes are adopted on the 1st of January every year, and the old ones destroyed.

NEW YORK'S LIQUOR LAW.

Puts the Entire Liquor Traffic Under State Control.

Behind locked doors the New York Assembly voted on the Raines excise bill Thursday, and before adjournment it passed by a vote of 84 yeas to 59 nays. The Raines liquor bill is a measure to put the entire liquor traffic and interests under State control. It abolishes all local excise boards and creates a State commissioner at a salary of $5,000, a deputy at $4,000, three inspectors at $4,000, $3,000 and $2,000, and sixty inspectors-at-large at $1,200 each and expenses. The commissioner's bureau is located at Albany. The bill raises the license rates in New York city to $800, in Brooklyn to $650, and in smaller cities to $500. The present license rate in New York for saloons is $250, and the granting of licenses is at the option of the municipal excise commissioners.

Under the Raines bill all night licenses and the sale of liquor on Sundays are prohibited except in hotels with meals. This prohibition extends to clubs. It fixes a fine for a violation of the law at not less than twice the amount of the license. It allows local option in towns but not in cities. It compels the posting of liquor licenses in windows of saloons, and also requires saloons to leave open the shades during the time they must close. No saloon can do business within 200 feet of a church or school.

The bill gives one-third of the net revenue collected to the State and two-thirds to the county. Under the present law the entire tax goes to the county or State. When first presented to the Legislature the bill equally divided the tax between the counties and the State. It is presumed that the immediate effect of the measure will be the wholesale reduction of the number of saloons in the State, and its adherents claim a great increase in State revenue.

HILL ON THE CUBAN WAR.

New York Senator Makes a Strong Speech in the Senate.

Senators Sherman and Hill were the conspicuous figures in the Cuban debate in the Senate Thursday, the New York Senator forcibly urging the mercenary character of the pending resolutions, while Mr. Sherman upheld them with another graphic arraignment of Spain and Gen. Weyler. It was the fourth day of the debate on the conference report and yet there was no evidence of a near approach to a final vote.

After an hour was consumed in clearing away routine matters, the Cuban resolutions were laid before the Senate, and Mr. Hill of New York was recognized. He pointed out that this being a conference report the resolutions could not be amended. He would, therefore, vote against the report in order that at a subsequent time amendments might be made. The Senator particularly objected to the third clause of the resolutions, stating that the United States has not intervened in the struggles between any European governments and their colonies, but that, owing to the proximity of Cuba, the United States should be prepared to intervene. This he declared to be ambiguous and unmeaning. We had intervened in such controversies. We had intervened and recognized the countries which had been colonies of Spain.

What the resolution sought to convey was a threat to intervene. To this extent the resolution was unnecessary. It is subject to doubtful construction and is a mischief breeder. It was liable to compromise us. The phrase the "United States should be prepared to protect the legitimate interests of our citizens by intervention" sounded like a threat or it was buncombe. "If this resolution means that we should increase our army, let us say so frankly and frame a bill for that purpose," said Mr. Hill. "If it means we should increase our navy, let us state it frankly and fearlessly and frame a bill to that end. Let us not indulge in idle boasts and threats and doubtful phrases as to our being prepared to protect legitimate interests by intervention."

Mr. Hill asked what these "legitimate" interests referred to were. Were there any "illegitimate interests?" This was not a proposition to intervene in the cause of humanity or to aid in the cause of freedom or to stop bloodshed, but to "protect our legitimate interests." Mr. Hill uttered the words with great scorn.

SOLONS UNDER GUARD.

Police Look After the Welfare of Kentucky Senator-Makers.

Gov. Bradley Thursday morning held a conference with Mayor Julian of Frankfort, Ky., and the latter ordered twenty extra policemen on duty in the rotunda of the capitol, the Governor expressing his intention of ordering out the State militia should it be necessary to preserve order. The one thing that seemed to be settled by the day's doings is that Kentucky will have but one representative in the United States Senate from March 4, 1897, when Senator Blackburn's term expires, until at least January, 1898, when the next Legislature can meet and fill the vacancy.

The newly installed Republican in the House, Dunlap, did not qualify before the joint assembly met and so was not a factor. The Republicans adopted the tactics of breaking the quorum, and this brought from Lieut. Gov. Worthington the ruling that seventy members constitute a quorum necessary to elect a Senator. So long as this ruling stands no election can be had except by breaking over party lines.

Members of the Legislature were nervous with suppressed excitement as the time drew near for the joint session. All eyes were turned on Sergeant-at-Arms Summers, the Blackburn Democrats demanding of him that he allow no one on the floor except members entitled to vote. Senator Branston made a motion that everybody be excluded, but when it was put the Republicans defeated it by refusing to vote.

WAR ON MOONSHINERS.

A Battle in North Carolina in Which Two Were Killed.

From the deep recesses of the mountains of western North Carolina comes a story of a desperate struggle in an isolated portion of that country between revenue officers on the one side and a band of moonshiners on the other. Some time ago it was learned that this gang were openly violating the revenue law by illicit distilling. They sent word to the officers warning them to keep away. Notwithstanding this broad threat, a band of revenue men set out from Greensboro the other day for the seat of war.

On arriving they dismounted, and were in the act of tying their horses when a storm of rocks and bullets was poured upon them. More shots were then exchanged on both sides, and the moonshiners began to sneak from their hiding places and made a dive for the forests. As they ran two of their number were killed, but the others, six in number, escaped to the woods. The dead men were identified as James and John Cook, two noted illicit distillers.

During the fight Revenue Officer Jones was shot three times, and, it is believed, will die. After the smoke of the battle had cleared the officers found stored away in caves and beside a stream that runs along the mountain side 100 casks of brandy and whisky. More trouble is feared, as that section is inhabited by a desperate class of people.

STUDENTS IN A FIGHT

BIG ROW AT ORATORICAL CONTEST.

Disgraceful Disturbance Begins Near the Seat Occupied by Gen. Harrison, Who Flees from the Building to Escape the Boisterous Collegians.

Rowdyish Collegians.

The Indiana intercollegiate contest at Indianapolis Friday night came near breaking up in a disgraceful riot. For nearly an hour after the time at which it was to have begun the students were in such disorder that no one ventured on the stage. A little before 9 o'clock Butler University, which had succeeded in running a wire from one upper box to another, suspended a large umbrella with the word "Butler" on it. Next there was run out a banner bearing the words "Butler on top." Then there was displayed a canvas caricature of the Indian girl with the word "Earlham" above the picture and the word "Humility" underneath it. These acts were hissed by the students of the other colleges, while the feeling against Butler was most intense. The wire on which the big umbrella was hung broke and the umbrella fell to the orchestra stall. Students from Butler and Earlham made a dash for it, and within a minute a hand-to-hand struggle was going on, in which twenty-five or thirty students were engaged.

The struggle began near the seat occupied by Gen. Harrison, who fled from the theater and did not return. The students fought up the center aisle until they were met by Capt. Dawson, of the city police force, and three patrolmen, who finally succeeded in separating the belligerents and capturing the handle of the umbrella, all that was left of it. If the police had not been in the house when the fight began the students of all the colleges would have taken a hand, as they were making their way over the seats when the police interfered.

Indian Girl Speaks.

The contest was made notable by the appearance among the contestants of a Sioux Indian girl, Gertrude Simmons, who is a freshman at Earlham College, Richmond. Her home is in Greenwood, Yankton agency, S. D. Of the six contestants she was the only woman and received the heartiest welcome. Her subject was "Side by Side," and her speech was a plea for the better treatment of the Indians.

Miss Simmons is 20 years old. When 8 years old she was wrapped in a blanket and brought to the White institute at Wabash, Ind. At the end of three years she was returned to her home, where she remained until December, 1890, when at her own request she was readmitted to the White institute. There she remained four and one-half years, and in September, 1895, she entered the freshman class at Earlham College. She aspires to become a thoroughly trained teacher among her own race. She possesses distinctly the characteristic complexion and features of the American Indian, yet with a sufficient ingraining of refinement to indicate a slight admixture of a fairer race. Twelve years ago, when she came to Indiana from her tribe, she could not speak a word of English.

The other contestants and their subjects were: "Christianity Reasonable," Edward P. Bell, Wabash College; "A Century of Progress," E. W. Clark, Butler College; "The New Divine Right," M. J. Bowman, Jr., Hanover; "The Brotherhood of Man," T. N. Ewing, De Pauw University; "The New Statesmanship," M. W. Schuh, Franklin College.

Nearly 1,000 students were in from the various colleges to attend the contest. A brass band came all the way from the banks of the Ohio to boom the Hanover man. A special train of six coaches carried the De Pauw students over from Greencastle.

The Indian girl won second place. She was marked first in delivery. De Pauw got second place, Butler third, Wabash fourth, Hanover fifth and Franklin sixth. The audience manifested discontent over the defeat of Miss Simmons for the first place.

Cut in Two by a Train.

Emil Wandrel, of Logansport, met a frightful death at Chicago Friday evening. Wandrel, who is a carpenter in the employ of the Pittsburg road, was sent from Logansport as one of the construction gang, and was leaving his work on the roundhouse, at May street and Carroll avenue, when a switch engine struck him. The blow was a glancing one and not of a nature to seriously injure the man. He was, however, hurled forward a distance of ten feet and fell across the rails directly in the path of the locomotive. The engineer attempted to stop and Wandrel's companions shouted to him, but he was stunned by his fall and the slow moving locomotive passed over him, severing the body above the hips.

Not Separated Even in Death.

Misses Honora and Annie Cavanagh, who lived at Alton with and for each other during the past seventy-three years, died within a few hours of each other Friday morning of la grippe, and were buried side by side in one grave Saturday. They came to this country during the year 1848, in company with their father, who was a native of County Wexford, Ireland. Nora and Annie were twins, and often declared that they never met anyone that they loved better than they loved each other, and that if a man ever loved one of them he never had courage to say so or attempt to separate them. Both women were well educated and intelligent, and left sufficient means to defray funeral expenses.

Jackson and Walling Scared.

Intense interest is taken by the Cincinnati public and in Kentucky in the hearing of the habeas corpus proceedings in the Circuit Court in the case of Walling and Jackson, indicted in Campbell County, Ky., for the murder of Pearl Bryan. They have been twice in the police court and twice in the court of common pleas. Judge Buchwalter remanded them Saturday to Sheriff Plummer, of Campbell County. Their attorneys resorted to habeas corpus. There is but one more dilatory step left them, and that is an appeal to the Supreme Court. From the fact that the public patience is strained and an appeal to the Supreme Court involves further delay, it is believed by some that they will be extradited.

Strung Up and Whipped.

Willis Hollers, an ex-convict at Mitchell, while drunk Friday night quarreled with his wife and beat her unmercifully. He then took the furniture from the house and, saturating it with coal oil, burned it in the street. He was arrested and placed in jail, where he was kept until a late hour. Soon after his release he was dragged from his house by White Caps, taken to a neighboring woods, where a rope was placed around his neck and he was strung up to a tree and soundly whipped. After promising to do better he was released and allowed to return home. He is in a critical condition.

Elkhart will soon have a new fire and police station, with a "two-story, stone-front structure, 100 feet front by 90 feet in depth," having windows of polished plate-glass, the whole surmounted by a tower for a fire bell.

Sullivan County clerk recently received the following note with a marriage license inclosed: "Fortville, Ind.—Marriage is a failure. My girl went back on me and I have no use for the license. Please take my name off the books."

Mr. B. F. Rudy, who is one of the members of the Anderson fire department, on going home for breakfast, found his wife dead and lying across the bed. Mrs. Rudy had been subject to heart trouble for years, but of late has been in good health.

The Marion canning factory was destroyed by fire. It was owned by Edwin H. Martin and is thought to have been burned by incendiaries. The insurance of $4,000 will not cover the loss. Fourteen people are thrown out of employment.

At Lafayette, Charles Sines died from a peculiar accident. He and Joseph Pettit were snow-balling. Sines hit Pettit with a ball of snow, and Pettit in sport threw a piece of plaster, which hit Sines above the right ear. The men were at Monon, but came to their homes in Lafayette, where Sines died soon after arriving. It was purely an accident, and Pettit was released.

Henry Becker, a glass worker of Elwood, who would not trust banks, but kept his money hidden under a carpet in an upper room of his house, was so unfortunate as to lose the sum of $500 by its being under the carpet when his house caught fire and burned. The roof of the house was ready to fall in when the fire was discovered and he was unable to save the money.

William Cluster, a highly respected citizen of Jackson Township, Howard County, was killed in Bagwell & Golding's saw-mill. He owed the mill owners a small sum of money and asked to be allowed to work it out, commencing only this week. A flying slab struck him on the head while he was watching the saw, killing him instantly. A widow and two children are left in destitute circumstances.

The oil fever and attendant excitement resulting from a strike of oil has again taken possession of Andersonians, who are interested in Frankton. Word was received in Anderson that one of the best gas wells in the vicinity of Frankton had developed into a powerful oiler, and that fluid was flowing from the well in great quantities. A company has been formed and the well and adjacent territory will be developed.

A letter mailed at West Point, Ind., is now in the Lafayette Postoffice addressed thus: "What though the snow be high as any mountain; what though the sleet and rain in torrents pour, so much that earth would seem like one vast fountain. No matter. With this letter swiftly sent to Mr. Garibaldi D. Maginnis, whom rumor whispers dwells on Burwell place. As 'D' implies, his middle name is Dennis, this pointer use his whereabouts to trace."

William Bowland, while Treasurer of Madison County, appropriated to his use as fees $11,422.02. The fee and salary law was in force when he was elected and his salary should have amounted to but $5,858.89. The County Commissioners, thinking the law would be declared unconstitutional, allowed him additional money under protest, and now suit is filed against Bowland asking judgment for $6,077.13. It will likely be settled in the Supreme Court.

The Ministers' Association of New Albany, was defeated recently in its fight against the applicants for liquor licenses before the Board of County Commissioners. The ministers objected to licenses granted on the ground that the applicants did not specifically describe the rooms in which they desired to sell. Attorneys were employed by both sides. The Commissioners decided in favor of the twenty applicants, and the ministers gave notice than an appeal would be taken to the Circuit Court. A few weeks ago the ministers circulated petitions in the several wards, but failed to secure a majority of voters.

The report of Commandant M. E. Grew of the Indiana State Soldiers' Home, for the last month shows that the home has 105 regular inmates and seven irregulars. The board has approved the application of twenty-five applicants for admission. A postoffice is to be established as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made, and Capt. Lewis G. Ross of Delphi, has been recommended as postmaster. The engineer was ordered to make a plat of the home cemetery at once. A donation of $50 was received from the Woman's Relief Corps at Winchester as the nucleus for a library fund, and was set apart for that purpose. The board will decide how much of the inmates' pension is to be applied for the support of the home.

REVIEW OF THEIR WORK AT WASHINGTON.

Detailed Proceedings of Senate and House—Bills Passed or Introduced in Either Branch—Questions of Moment to the Country at Large.

The Legislative Grind.

The House Saturday entered upon the consideration of the eighth of the thirteen regular appropriation bills, that providing for the postal service. It is the largest of the supply bills, carrying over $91,000,000. A series of attempts were made to increase the compensation of fourth-class postmasters, but they went before points of order. The controverted items in the bill relate to postoffice inspectors and special mail facilities. Mr. Dockery (Dem.) of Missouri, opened the annual fight against the appropriation of $196,600 for special facilities on the trunk lines from New York to New Orleans. Similar appropriations for this special service have been carried since 1877. The bill also carries $1,000 for special service from Kansas City to Newton, Kan., and $100,000 for service from Chicago to Council Bluffs. This compensation was, Mr. Dockery declared, in addition to the regular compensation.

District of Columbia business consumed the major portion of Monday in the House. Among the bills passed was one to decrease the cost of gas from $1.50 to $1 a thousand. This was the outcome of a long fight against the gas company. The consideration of the postoffice appropriation bill was continued, but no important amendments were adopted. The speaker announced the appointment of Mr. Hendricks (Dem.) of Kentucky to the Banking and Currency Committee. A resolution was adopted calling on the Secretary of war for estimates of the cost of repairing the breakwater at Cleveland, O. A bill was passed to change the times for holding court in the northern district of California. The House then took up District of Columbia matters. Pending the consideration of these it adjourned.

The House Wednesday passed the postoffice bill. The feature of the debate was the attack on the "spy system" in connection with letter carriers. The salaries of the special inspectors have been paid under the current law out of a fund at the disposal of the first assistant postmaster general. This fund was cut off by the present bill, but provision was made for the employment of thirty additional regular inspectors under the fourth assistant postmaster general, increasing the appropriation from $176,000 to $212,000. Mr. Quigg, of New York, led the fight against this increase and after a protracted debate his amendment to reduce the appropriation to $176,000 prevailed by a vote of 70 to 57. Nothing of importance was accomplished in the Senate.

Senators Sherman and Hill were the conspicuous figures in the Senate Thursday, when the former urged and the latter opposed the measures recognizing the Cuban insurgents. In the course of his speech Mr. Sherman paid a glowing tribute to the patriotism and fidelity of President Cleveland and his readiness to uphold the country's flag. Mr. Hill contended that if this country interfered in the matter at all, it should be upon different grounds than those so far urged, viz.: protection of our commercial interests. The Dupont election case was taken up in the Senate, Mr. Pritchard speaking in advocacy of the majority report in favor of seating Mr. Dupont. The bill creating the "Art Commission of the United States" was passed. The following bills were also passed: Granting government lands in aid of the industrial school at Tuskogee, Ala.; granting certain lands to Colorado Springs, Colo.; for the construction of a revenue cutter to cost $150,000, for use on the Gulf of Mexico and tributaries; to permit owners of claims to iron and coal mines on forest reservations to perfect their title thereto and to procure a patent therefor. In the House a resolution was adopted by which the claim of Coleman (Rep.) of the second Louisiana district to the seat of Mr. Buck (Dem.) was decided in favor of the latter. A bill was passed extending the time for completing a bridge by the Union Railway Company across the Monongahela river.

Commercial Travelers Put Together.

Mr. Fraser-Crierie, manager of the Queen's Hotel, Montreal, has decided upon adopting an improvement in the hotel which will be a decided innovation in Montreal. It is a special room for commercial travelers, and is not to be confounded with anything in the way of the ordinary sample rooms. In the proposed accommodation, the commercial men will be entirely by themselves and separated from the other hotel guests. They will have their own dining-room and their own waiters. The dining-room after meals will, also, serve as a general smoking and lounging room, where the commercial guests may receive their friends. This idea has long been in favor in England, where it has been carried out with success by some of the best hotels.

Maine's Great Man.

Maine's biggest and strongest man, John Moriarty, died in Oldtown recently, of typhoid fever. He was 6 feet 9½ inches tall, and weighed 240 pounds. He was broad and big-boned, and some idea of his build may be had from the fact that, despite his weight, he was a very lean man. In practically every way he could do as much work as two men, and he was known all over the State for his feats of strength. He worked most of the time in the lumber camps, and was valuable as a peacemaker as well as a worker. Many stories are told of his prowess in putting down fights and small riots. He was a very peaceful and good-natured man.

On Hire.

At one time the Swiss used to hire themselves as soldiers to the kings of other countries. They were thus known as "mercenaries" and were thought none the better of for accepting such service. But though this system of letting themselves out on hire has long since ceased to exist, one finds a memorial of the practice in France in the word suisse, which means a porter, or church beadle. At the porter's lodge of the Embassy in Paris once could be read the words "Demandez au suisse"—"Inquire of the porter."

Friend of John Brown.

Rev. Dr. William H. Furness, who died in Philadelphia, was an ardent abolitionist for thirty years before the war, and publicly declared his opinions on the subject in many of his sermons. He took a leading part in the public prayer meeting held in Philadelphia on the day of John Brown's execution, and afterward, with two or three others, went to receive the body when it was brought back from the gallows. He was the oldest living graduate of Harvard College and the last surviving member of the class of 1820.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

CHAPTER XLII.—(Continued.)

Mrs. Dene said nothing to Jane of what had passed. She kissed her affectionately on both cheeks, and repeated her invitation.

"You may change your mind at the last moment. I shall hope you will," she said.

Then the train steamed out of the station, and Jane, as with tearful eyes she waved her hand in farewell, felt as though the last link to that brighter life were sundered. She turned away and walked quickly home.

As she went, she saw Valentine Graeme sauntering along with Miss Knollys in the direction of the public gardens. His head was lowered, and he was talking with evident earnestness, while she listened with as evident attention. Presently they discovered Jane, and looking round waved their tennis-bats in friendly invitation. But Jane shook her head in refusal. The realities of life were beginning, and she must shirk her responsibilities no longer. How she envied Diana, with love and no care to spoil it. Her blushing face, so altered since first it had been seen at Alipore, had told its own tale, and the Adjutant, for a rejected suitor, looked wonderfully content. The girl hurried on. Now that she was actually on her way home she felt a strange longing to be there to help or comfort, at any rate to get over the dreadful meeting with her father.

As she entered the house, she saw him come out of the sitting-room, and go toward the dining-room.

"Father," she cried, in a low, strained voice.

How changed he was—so old and bowed, and with a dazed expression on his face that Jane could compare to nothing but the look of a hunted animal whose last chance of escape had been cut off! She did not know how nearly she had guessed the truth. Turning, she entered the sitting-room. Mrs. Knox was sitting there with a handkerchief to her eyes, and a big blue envelope lying in her lap.

"Oh, that is you, child, is it?" she said, presenting her cheek for a caress. "Well, I'm glad enough you've come. It was getting about as much as I could bear. Your father's that queer and put out about trifles that I begin to think he's losing his wits altogether. He's ill, I know; but illness won't account for everything."

"What is it, mother?"

"Well, my dear, it's about our going home. He sent in an application for leave, as I told you, and this paper came when he was out. I opened it—perhaps it was that which made him angry—and you have no idea how he went on when I told him."

"What was it, mother?" asked Jane, a little impatiently; she knew of old how difficult it was to compass a fact when her mother was excited.

"They say they are compelled to refuse his application for the present. He'll get it all right in the end, I've no doubt; but, if not, why, it can't be helped. It's no use making such a fuss. Though I must say," warming up, and getting indignant as she talked, "I think they might have shown a little more consideration, especially in a case of sickness. I can't guess what they mean by it, I'm sure."

But Jane could. She remembered how the Deputy Commissioner had assured her that he knew who the murderer of Jacob Lynn was; how he had told her too that every precaution would be taken that he should not leave the station. Now he had proved his words.

She sunk into a chair, looking as dazed and alarmed as the Quartermaster had looked a few moments before.

The blow had fallen at last. Oh, heaven help them all.

CHAPTER XLIII.

She was powerless. Mr. Knollys had never liked her, she knew, and was most unlikely to be turned from his purpose by any appeal that she might make. The only weapon she possessed was useless; she might as well direct a sword-thrust against a rock as hope that her beauty or distress would touch his world-hardened heart. She felt that only one could help her—the Colonel. But would it be safe to trust him with such a secret? Might it not be his duty to act contrary to their interests? She must do nothing without consulting her father, and to do this, she must confess the knowledge she had gained.

On her second meeting with her father, later on the day of her return, when he had had time to recover a little from the shock of his refused leave, he had greeted her affectionately, if somewhat absently, and since then he had never seemed content when she was away. His manner, which to his wife was often querulous, even violent at times, to his daughter was always gentle. At an invitation from Jane he would, unwilling as he always appeared to leave the house, go out at once; his food, which otherwise would have remained neglected until cold, or perhaps altogether, at her request would be partaken of with pitiful docility. He was as unlike the bluff, handsome sergeant major of a year ago as it was possible to be, and in nothing more changed than in his demeanor to his wife. Then he had been as proud of her as is only possible for a man to be of some possession that might be supposed to be beyond his attainments or deserts. Now, he could not patiently endure her presence. So it happened that it was Jane who was generally alone with him, and therefore she had no difficulty in finding an opportunity to speak to him, as she had determined.

"Tell me of your visit, Jenny. You have never told me about it. Did you have a pleasant time?" he said to her.

"Very pleasant, father.

"Your mother told me that there was some talk of your marrying the Hon. Barry Larron, but, perhaps"—it was on the tip of his tongue to add, she lied to me; but consideration for his daughter (not his wife) prompted him to substitute "she was mistaken."

"There was some talk of it, father," confessed Jane, quietly; "but it will never be."

"I am sorry for that. I had hoped—hoped—I should like to see you settled before——"

"I know what you would say, father. I have known it all for some time, and I want to help to conceal it, if I can."

He peered at her through the gloom with dilated eyes, afraid of mistaking her meaning, through his guilty conscience always dwelling on the one dreadful subject, yet her awe-struck tones might have removed all doubt.

"About Jacob Lynn," she went on, in a whisper, and would have continued, but his head dropped upon his hands, and he groaned so deeply that she knew he had understood.

Yet he dare not raise his eyes toward the daughter whose life, by his mad, impulsive act, he had ruined.

Not until Jane stole over to her father's side and drew his head on to her breast did he venture to look up.

Then little by little the whole story was drawn from his lips; how he had met Jacob Lynn that afternoon, intoxicated, and stayed to remonstrate with him.

"Give me your daughter and I will never drink again," had been the reply, with a drunken laugh.

"I would sooner see her dead at my feet than married to such a one as you," the Quartermaster had retorted, warmly.

Then in his fury, scarcely knowing, scarcely responsible for what he said, the trooper had poured out such a torrent of abuse that it was with difficulty the other refrained from a reply. He accused Jane of having schemed his removal from Alipore that she might in the end marry the Colonel; in his drunken rage he railed at her and called her names. At last as one foul epithet escaped his lips, the Quartermaster could restrain himself no longer. The fatal blow was given—only one, yet so terrible in its results, and likely to be the undoing of them all.

When her mother entered the room to keep her father company, Jane closed the door softly and stole away, and at once wrote a note to Colonel Prinsep.

"Dear Colonel Prinsep"—she began, though she thought with a faint smile of his suggestion, that as a penance she should use his Christian name, she did not do so then—"You said that when I wanted help I was to ask you for it. I need it now. Will you come to-morrow morning as early as you can? Yours sincerely, JANE KNOX."

She dispatched it at once, and an hour later received the reply:

"Dear Jenny: I shall be with you to-morrow morning at ten o'clock, without fail. Be very sure that I will do for you all that is in my power. Always your friend, STEPHEN PRINSEP."

The following morning Jane was walking on the road in front of the house soon after nine o'clock. After further consideration she thought it wiser not to wait for Colonel Prinsep inside. Walls have ears, and it would never do to risk the danger of any one overhearing their conversation. Tired and overwrought by the excitement through which she had gone, it seemed an endless time before he came, though really he was a little before the appointed hour.

"You have been waiting for me?" he exclaimed. "Child, how tired you look!"

He had made a movement to lead her back to the house, but she drew back.

"Not there. Some place where there is no chance of our being overheard. It is something important I have to say, or I should not have asked you to come."

He looked at her reproachfully, but said nothing. She was tired—in trouble—and he had come to help her.

They turned into the compound of the next bungalow, which they remembered was empty, yet for the moment, in their abstraction, had forgotten how it was Jacob Lynn had been found dead there.

Simultaneously they recollected, and Colonel Prinsep would have taken her away, but she resisted.

"This place is as well as another; what does it matter?" she said, wearily.

"At least, come into the sun and sit down," he said, authoritatively; and having found her a seat that looked away from the spot they had all such good reason to remember, he waited patiently for her to say more.

"Did you know," she began, abruptly, "that my father had applied for leave home?"

"Yes. I knew it," he acknowledged.

"And that it had been refused?"

"All such papers pass through my hands. Yes, I knew it had been refused.

"And can't—will you tell me why?"—anxiously.

"I had a private letter this morning telling me that all leave in the regiment would be refused until the inquiry into Lynn's death was completed," he answered, slowly.

She gave a faint gasping cry. Until now she had clung to the hope that there might have been some trivial cause for that ominous refusal, and it cost her something to relinquish it.

"Is that all you wanted to know?" he asked her presently, and for a few moments received no reply.

"Let me tell you quickly, then, it will be less difficult to talk about. It is"—she spoke as though the words were being forced one by one from her lips—"it is my father who is guilty of that murder; and I want you to tell me how best to screen him?"

"I have guessed that it was so," he remarked gravely; then as she turned suddenly pale and started to her feet, terrified by a new fear he added, quickly: "No, no; no one else suspects him that I know of. It was something you said, which I misunderstood at the time, that first awakened my suspicions."

"Something that I said," she repeated, blankly, wondering how she could have been weak enough to so betray herself, and whether to him only.

"Yes. One day at Mrs. Dene's, you said something about an inquiry that the Commissioner was instituting, and begged me to go away. I knew nothing then of your suspicions of myself. The only reason I could imagine for your warning was that your father was guilty, and you feared that my evidence might tell against him. To allay your fears, unfounded as they were, I was prepared to go, and had made all the arrangements to do so, when you explained to me what you had really thought. Then of course it was unnecessary I should leave. Now tell me how I can help you best."

"I want you to tell me."

"Then let me hear the whole story, as it occurred, or at least so much as you can bear to speak of."

She told him all she knew, with dry lips and a faltering voice.

"Why, it is not murder at all—scarcely manslaughter!" he exclaimed, at its conclusion.

"Then you do not blame him—not altogether, at least?"

"Blame him? Why, what else could he have done? Any one would have struck the miscreant who dare to malign you—some would have done more."

"I don't see how they could do more than kill him," said Jane, with a little matter-of-fact air, becoming more like herself now that she saw how lightly the Colonel seemed to take the revelation which to her had been terrible beyond words.

He even gave a half smile, which was reflected in her face. Light seemed to be coming at last, and a sense of safety now that he knew all, overcame her former dread.

"You say," continued Colonel Prinsep, thoughtfully, after awhile, "that Mr. Knollys thinks that it was I who caused Lynn's death?"

"He did think so once; but whether he does so now I am not sure. This refusing to grant my father's leave——"

"All leave in the regiment is stopped, you must remember."

"Ah! true. But then even if he had not suspected him before he might now, if he looked upon his application for leave as an attempt to escape," suggested Jane, shrewdly.

Colonel Prinsep reflected for a moment before he replied.

"I think our friend has too overweening an idea of his own perspicacity to be easily turned from his first opinion. However, that remains to be seen. I am going now to find out how the land lies, and think what is best to be done. You shall hear from me again to-day. Good-by, Jenny—keep up a good heart."

He clasped her hand firmly and smiled encouragingly into her eyes. Then, as she took the path leading to her own compound, he went in the opposite direction; not toward the Cutchery—as Jane, looking over her shoulder, could not fail to see—but toward the officers' mess.

STORY OF ANDREW JACKSON.

An Incident Illustrating the Sympathetic Nature of the Man.

An incident in the life of President Andrew Jackson is recalled by the recent death in Jackson, O., of his private secretary, Samuel Baker, at the ripe age of 95. Mr. Baker was very enthusiastic in sounding the praises of President Jackson and continually insisted that he had one of the most sympathetic natures that ever graced the White House chair. As a case in point he tells the following incident during the first term of Mr. Jackson:

A young man in the army had been sentenced to be shot for desertion, and his wife had prayed for a hearing with the President before the execution and had been granted it. Baker used to dwell upon the nervousness of President Jackson before the interview. He was disquiet, restless and he seemed overcome with dread. At the appointed hour the woman was ushered into his presence. With her were her two small children. These three had scarcely entered the room when the woman fell upon her knees at the feet of the President, and the children knelt at either side and the three prayed to him.

"Such prayers and praying," Baker used to say, "I never saw nor heard in my life."

Jackson sat through it all with tears streaming down his face, and his entire body convulsed with sobs; it seemed as if his very determination had forsaken him, and he seemed incapable of moving or uttering a sound. The woman had finished; and with the children clinging to him on either side the President arose. With a voice full of tenderness and pity he told the woman that what she asked could not be granted. He told her the safety of the army demanded that there should be no interference with justice in such cases, and then, his courage forsaking him, he fled into an inner office.

"There it was," said Baker, "that I found him on a lounge, completely prostrated. He did not arouse for some time, and when he did it was with the feebleness of a man who had just recovered from a long illness. Slowly he rose, and, with a look of despair that I can never forget, he turned to me and uttered these words: 'I would to God that I was not President.'"

But It Never Came Back.

"Willie, do keep your head inside the car window," pleaded the small boy's mother for the fifth time. "Your new hat will blow off and you will lose it."

But Willie thought more of the scenery than he did of his hat, and he wouldn't miss the chance of seeing a truly cow or a sure-enough calf for all the hats in Christendom. His mother tried to close the window, but he kept his head out and screamed, so she tried to look resigned and left it up. Then she thought she would frighten him, and when he was watching a real sheep she snatched his hat from his head and hid it. In a moment he drew his bare head in and bawled lustily.

"What's the matter, Willie?" she asked.

"I've lost my hat."

"There, I told you you would; but don't cry."

He did cry just the same.

"Now, keep still, Willie, and I'll whistle and it will come back."

She puckered her lips, whistled, and the hat was clapped on Willie's head. He was greatly amazed, but whether at his mother's attempt to whistle or at the unexpected return of his new hat was not entirely clear.

She had just settled herself comfortably in her seat, satisfied that she had taught her boy a lesson, when he flung his hat out of the window and exclaimed:

"Now, whistle again, ma!"

Joke on the Bishop.

Bishop Paret, of Baltimore, tells a good story at his own expense. He was recently on a train, and near him sat two drunken men. Presently one of the men, with a forcible expletive, remarked to the other that some one had robbed him of a $20 bill. His friend remarked: "Oh, I guess not; you must have it about you somewhere." But the other insisted he hadn't, and that he had the bill when he came aboard the train. Some one had robbed him, and he proposed to find it if he had to search the whole crowd. "As it happened," says Bishop Paret, "I had a $20 bill, and that was all, and as I was the nearest man to them, and the first likely to be approached, I felt a little uncomfortable. Then it occurred to me to pretend to be asleep. Sure enough, in a minute more I was accosted with, 'I say, neighbor!' but I made no answer. Then the men grabbed my arm and shook me, but to no use, as I didn't wake up. He kept on shaking, however, and always a little more forcible, until at last his friend interposed with: 'I say, Bill, let him alone, will you; he's drunker'n you are!'"

Dr. Franz Smolka, of Lemberg, Galicia, has recently had a double anniversary celebration—that of his condemnation to be hanged and that of his 86th birthday. He was a prominent mover in the agitation that preceded the revolution of 1848 and sentenced to die, but received a commutation to imprisonment. He has since been twice elected president of the Austrian Reichsrath.

COL. R. W. THOMPSON

NOW LIVING QUIETLY AT TERRE HAUTE, IND.

The Once Secretary of the Navy Passing His Declining Days in a Tranquil Home Planned by Himself and Wife Nearly Half a Century Ago.

Four Score and Seven.

In his pleasant home at Terre Haute, Ind., Col. Richard W. Thompson is enjoying a well-earned rest, after half a century of important judicial, legislative and administrative duties. At the age of 87, vigorous and active as many men 30 years younger, his intellect is as strong as ever, and the clear apprehension, the sterling character that made him an important figure in Congress and in the Presidential Cabinet during vital periods of the nation's history, manifest themselves powerfully when he is called upon to express his sentiments on questions of the day. Brought up in the vicinity of such men as Jefferson, Madison and Monroe, the associate of Adams, Jackson, Webster, Clay and Calhoun, the intimate friend of later statesmen and orators, his memories embrace the most interesting phases of national politics, and all clear as cameos. Other men in various positions in public life have accumulated millions of dollars, Col. Thompson is far from being wealthy, as rich men are rated, and the competency he enjoys was derived from sources wholly separate from politics.

The venerable ex-Secretary of the Navy was born near Culpeper, Va., in 1809, of ingrained American stock, and throughout his life his habits of thought, his hospitality, his culture and his courtly ways have been those of the educated, well-bred Southerner. Twenty-one years later, at the Christmas season, he left for the West and settled at Bedford, Ind., as a young lawyer. In 1842 he came to Terre Haute, and a brilliant career opened up for him. A term in the State Legislature had been followed by one as State Senator, and he was now in Congress. He was returned in 1848, then appointed Circuit Judge, and from that event until he was handed the naval portfolio by President Hayes was nearly all the time serving the people in a judicial capacity. During the war he was provost marshal of his district and drilled four regiments—an official capacity fraught with danger in that particular district, where that somewhat mysterious and deadly association, the Knights of the Golden Circle, were a strong present social feature. It was in his first term in Congress, in 1841, that Col. Thompson met Abraham Lincoln. The acquaintance grew into a friendship which endured until the death of Lincoln. When the latter was President he urged Col. Thompson to take a seat on the bench of the Court of Claims. The ex-Congressman declined, as he had the proffer of the Austrian mission under Taylor and the recordership of the Land Office in Fillmore's administration, but he was a prominent figure in all campaigns. In the old Tipecanoe campaign he gave the elder Harrison zealous support on the stump. As a Presidential elector, he cast his vote for the first President of the name. Nearly fifty-six years afterward his support materially aided the grandson in securing the nomination and election. He was several times a Presidential elector, and was a member of all the historic or notable Republican conventions after the formation of the party. Col. Thompson retired from the Hayes Cabinet shortly before the close of the administration, to become president of the American committee of the Panama Canal Company. He was also a director of the Isthmus Railway.

Col. Thompson is passing his declining days in a tranquil home, surrounded by great elms that look as if they were natural forest growth, planted by himself and his young wife close upon a half century ago. He has just completed his interesting "Personal Recollections." Full of entertaining anecdote, he is as well a rare analyst of human excellence and the national progress. He believes that Webster's oration will never die, that Calhoun was a brilliant man always underestimated, that Clay was the greatest speaker of his age; but he does not believe that American eloquence died with them. He considers that, as great questions come up for settlement, able disputants will meet the occasion, and that American pride and energy can compass all requirements that arise to make it necessary to maintain the supremacy of the United States.

FEB. 29 PLAYS HAVOC WITH BIRTHDAYS.

The unhappy small beings born Saturday, Feb. 29, will spend their youthful years without a birthday. If they could appreciate what has befallen them their lusty lungs, which are now getting into full swing, would redouble their efforts. Leap year has caught them unawares and, though the mistake cannot be laid at their door, they will suffer for it. For eight long years they will be without that great joy of childhood, a birthday celebration, unless in the kindness of their hearts their relatives conspire to make Feb. 28 do instead, and even then it will not be a real birthday, but a play one. Some may die before they have reached that eventful eighth year, and so will go down to their graves without knowing the glory of a legitimate annual celebration of their birth. Of the most long-lived among them it is safe to say that more than three-quarters of their lives will be passed without enjoying this happy experience. At the best their lot is an unhappy one. The boys can never, as custom demands, be put into knickerbockers on the sixth anniversary of their appearance on earth. When their sixth birthday comes they will be business men nearly 30 years of age, paying for their own clothes, or else, as is sometimes done, making the tailor pay for them. They will never have the delight of announcing that they are "Five years old to-day." They will always be so many years "going on" so much. Any way one looks at it Feb. 29 is a day to be avoided, if one intends to be born. And all this that the procession of the equinoxes may go on undisturbed.

NO CHANCE TO CHEAT.

Conductors to Carry "Register and Fare Collector."

The nickel-in-the-slot machine is about to enter a new field in Detroit. It is to assist street car conductors in their work, and is called a "register and fare collector." It is a nickel-plated contrivance which will hang around the conductor's neck. Fingers that itch for illegitimate coin will not touch the fares. The conductor will present his machine in the passenger's will sit down assured that it will reach the coffers of the company instead of the pocket of the conductor. The conductor will be ordered to finger neither the coin nor the ticket. They pass directly from the hand of the passenger into the slot. Once within the machine they cannot be shaken out. When they finally drop through into the receiver at the base of the device they are registered. At the end of the route it is the company's cashier and not the conductor who unlocks the slot machine and takes out the receiver. He has in his possession keys marked with each conductor's name and number. The register is reset, another receiver is attached, and the conductor sets on his way.

The Detroit conductors are objecting to the use of the new device, because they say that it brands them as thieves, but the officers of the company assure them it is for the purpose of curing losses from carelessness quite as much as from dishonesty. The company averages $20,000 each year in losses from both these sources.

Besides the slot machine which the Detroit company is to confer upon all its conductors, the man who calls out "Fare!" will be loaded down with another device. This is the change box, built on the plan of the dime banks, which were popular a few years ago. This is merely a contrivance to get out of the difficulty of diving into the pocket after change. The company has been investigating all sorts and manners of contrivances to dismay kleptomania on the part of the conductor, but the register is the invention regarded as the safest, however irksome it may be for the conductor to wear it.

The Newest New Woman.

Out West there is a "traveling man" who is a curiosity—simply because this man is a woman. She is Mrs. J. Jagodnigg, of Kansas City, and her line is one that is dear to the average woman's heart—fine furs. Mrs. Jagodnigg represents a big furrier, and she has just returned from a successful business trip through the Northwest. Her samples consist of several thousand dollars' worth of all manner of fur wraps for men and women, and she carries as well a full line of fur trimmings, from ermine down to the least expensive. At Salt Lake City she was given a big reception, and many prominent ladies called at her hotel and paid their respects.

Keep the Children Busy.

Almost every family can allow the children a tiny spot their very own for the planting of a few seeds or bulbs or slips, the care of which will give occupation and keep the children at home when otherwise they would plead to go somewhere or to have somebody come to see them.—Womankind.

COURT.

Work has been pretty thronged this week. The Zonker-Nickey-Blucher case that we reported dropped from the docket, was only one of the cases in that matter. It was the suit for trespass in going onto the farm, and was in the nature of a criminal case. After this was out of the way, the case in which civil damages were claimed came up, and has been running several days. There were quite a number of witnesses and they did not get through examining these till yesterday about the middle of the afternoon. It was after 4 o'clock when the jury, after taking a rest, came back into the court room to hear the attorneys make their pleas. Judge McClellan and C. M. Phillips were the attorneys for Zonker, while E. D. Hartman and Roby & Link were for the defendants.

The trial jury as now constituted are: Al. Farrington, Joseph Ferguson, R. S. S. Reed, John Whitehurst, Isaiah Baughman, J. S. Kalb. T. J. Baxter, John Barnes, Oscar Klink, Wm. Peppie, Phillip Ginder and W. S. Berry.

A large number of witnesses were down from Fairfield yesterday and today in the criminal trial over the fight between Brooks and Lower, reported a short time ago. Brooks and Lower had had trouble as far back as when they were threshing. But after it was over, Lower was advised to keep clear of Brooks, who had a reputation for a desperate temper. But not long ago the men came together unexpetedly and a fight was on at once. Brooks cut Lower with a knife, and as a consequence has lately been a resident of Auburn, with headquarters at the Stroh House. The sheriff has already subpoenaed forty-seven witnesses, and still there's more to follow. This is to be brought on as soon as the Zonker case is done.

This, Saturday morning, the jury came in when court was called at 9 o'clock and their foreman, T. J. Baxter handed the judge their verdict. It was in the form of answers to a multitude of type written questions and took the judge about half an hour of rapid work to read it. Then the jury all said it was o. k. and then the attorneys began to scratch their heads to see which side was ahead. The fact is, it was a "special verdict," one in which the jury decide on all the "facts" involved in the case and on these findings the judge has to make up the verdict. When the judge has figured up how much —— M of oak lumber over 26 inches in diameter, at $12 per M., and —— M. of oak under 26 inches and not less than 20 inches in diameter, at $10 per M., and —— M. of oak lumber under 20 inches at $6 per M., and —— M. of bitter hickory at $8 per M., and —— M. of red oak at $— per M., and —— M. of whitewood at $10 per M., and —— of ties at 30c each are worth, and then how much of this value is still due Zonker after deducting the amount already paid him, then, and not till then will the plaintiff and the defendant, and the lawyers of the plaintiff and defendant, and the general public who read the COURIER, know just who is in the soup, and how deep. These special findings may be good things, but they are a terrible strain on the average brain.

The way they usually sit.

As a member of the general public, we object to this arrangement, for want of formality, and shall appeal the case for these reasons.

The case of State vs Brooks, for assault and battery with intent to murder, was at once brought on and the tired and sleepy jurors had to go right on. Prosecutor Eugene Davis drew a bead on the jury and asked them if they were acquainted with the parties or had formed an opinion and so on and so forth. (See report of Brooks trial.)

Attention Democrats!

In pursuance of the action of the central committee at their meeting held in Waterloo Feb. 29, 1896, the democratic voters of DeKalb county are requested to meet on Saturday March 28 1896 at 2 p. m. at the usual places of holding their caucuses for the purpose of electing 27 delegates to the congressional convention, to be held at Kendallville Tuesday, April 7, 1896, and the same number of delegates to the joint senatorial convention between Noble and DeKalb counties, to be held at a time to be hereafter determined.

In said convention each township will be entitled to the following number of delegates.

Butler	1
Concord	2
Fairfield	2
Franklin	1
Grant	2
Jackson	1
Keyser	6
Newville	½
Richland	1
Smithfield	1
Stafford	½
Troy	½
Union	4½
Wilmington	4
Total	27

The committeemen should change the hour of meeting in their respective townships to suit the convenience of the voters.

It is requested and desired that a good attendance may be had in every township in the county.

WM. J. FREDERICK,
Chairman of Co. Com.
J. WM. WAGNER,
Sec'y.

CONGRESSIONAL CONVENTION.

At a meeting composed of the chairmen of the Democratic Central Committees of the several counties of the Twelfth Congressional District and the district committeemen, held at Fort Wayne on the 8th day of January, 1896, it was decided that the convention for the nomination of a democratic candidate for Congress, to represent the district, would be held at the Opera House in the city of Kendallville on

Tuesday April 7, 1896,

at 2 o'clock p. m. All delegates hereto fore elected, or such as may be hereafter elected to said convention are requested to take notice and be present at the convention on at the time and place above stated without further notification. Democrats generally are invited to be present. The representation for the several counties is as follows, and is based upon one delegate for each one hundred and fractional fifty votes and over cast for Claude Matthews for Governor in 1896

Cash In Circulation

Secretary Carlisle's recent letter in reply to an inquiry from the senate gives a table showing the total amount of money in circulation in the United States every year since 1800. It also gives the population and the average amount of money per individual citizen. It does much to dispel the idea that the amount of money has much to do with the amount of business transacted. In the "flush times" in 1867 soon after the war, and the times now often pointed to by the soft money advocates as a sort of a millennium of peace and prosperity, there was a population of 36,000,000 and a money circulation of $661,000,000. This is at the rate of $18.28 per capita. In 1874 during the greatest industrial panic ever know in this country and when the greenback party and the grangers flourished and demanded "more money and plenty of it," the population was 42,000,000, the circulation $776,000,000 and the per capita circulation $18.13. It will be seen that the difference between "flush times" and "hard times" was 15 cents each—hardly enough to account for the difference in prosperity. Again, in what the republicans tell us were flush times, the year after the passage of the McKinley bill, or in 1891, the population was 64,000,000, the circulation $1,497,000,000, or $23.41 per capita, but in the panic times of 1894, the population was 68,000,000, circulation $1,661,000,000, or $24.30 per capita. Here we have 89 cents per individual more money in circulation in the panic and hard times year of '94 than we had in the flush year of '91. These figures illustrate the complete fallacy of the belief that the more money there is the more prosperous the times will be. The whole table goes to confirm this: The cause of hard times and flush times will have to be sought in some other way than the amount of money in circulation.

An Honest Man's Story.

GREENVILLAGE, PA., Jan. 23, '96.

DEAR SIR:—Thank God there is a medicine that will cure catarrh. Mr. Pretinger I used your sample box of catarrh which you sent me. The first night I used it it helped me. May God bless you for your kindness. I used the little box you sent me and about half of a 50 cent jar. They keep it in Chambersburg. I have told a great many people about your medicine. Hon. 'Squire Britton, brother-in-law to me, is using it; he says it is helping him very much; he has catarrh very bad. Mrs. G. D. Ludwig, daughter of me, is using your medicine. I use it in the evening before retiring to bed and am feeling better now than I have for the last five years. My head is clear and I have more energy for the last five years. My head is clear and I have more energy for work and business. Before I used your medicine I felt many a time that I did not care wheter I was living or dead; I had no energy; I did not care for anything. I had catarrh over sixty-seven years; mother had catarrh and it turned into consumption; she died in her sixty fourth year. I have a farm up at Strasburg, seven miles from Greenvillage. On nice days I drive up to the farm and work. Mr. Pretzinger I think it would pay you to have it put in all the Franklin County papers as I am a reliable, honest man, so the people say, middling well acquaint over the County. Yours truly,

GEO. K. ZOLLINGER.

A Remarkable Cure.

Mrs. H. B. Adams, 1609 Wabash ave, Chicago, says: "I had a scrofulous taint of the blood from childhood which however, remained dormant. An ulcer began on the side of the nose, having all the appearance of a most malignant cancer. The agony of mind I suffered cannot be described as I contemplated the progress of such a malignant disease. Finally I was induced to try Foley's Sarsaparilla. It appeared to neutralize the poison in the blood. The growth of the ulcer ceased. The diseased tissues in the bottom and edges of the sore seemed to loosen and the natural flesh to take its place. No part of the disease remains." Robbins & McCord. 10-13

We did not learn whether Mr. Husselman is lecturing at a farmer's institute or whether it was before the classes connected with the experimental state farm there.

—Fremont Smith, who lives near the Junction, reports a queer incident which happened while boiling sugar water. He and his hired man were cutting wood, and in order to get some sugar water to drink, a few small trees were tapped. These furnished considerable water and nearly a half barrel had accumulated. Mr. Smith took it to the house and his wife proceeded to boil it down over the stove. Mr. Smith had recently repaired his house and the rooms were finished with hard wood and varnished. The sweet steam which arose filled the room and utterly ruined the paint on the woodwork about the room. It was raised in blisters, and Mr. Smith now has John Jones out there repainting the woodwork in this room.

D. D. Snyder who is here for a few days was up at Angola Tuesday night, with his brother, John W. Snyder. Yesterday morning while he and his brother's family were at breakfast, a flue from the register heated the adjacent woodwork, so that it caught fire and being in a place difficult to get at, they were unable to stop it. An alarm was given, and the fire department came and had quite a struggle to save the building. As it was, it is considerably damaged mostly by water. The contents were all taken out, and suffered but little. The loss is covered by insurance, but the family suddenly found themselves without a home. However, that part is easily fixed, where the neighbors are so kind as theirs, for they had several homes opened for them at once. They cannot occupy the dwelling till it is replastered and repaired.

—It is now rumored among republicans that each delegate to the St. Louis convention will have to chip in about $200 to help pay the expenses of rooms down there for the Indiana delegation. As the entire delegation will number but thirty, and as each delegate pays his own expenses, it looks as if $6,000 is a pretty big price to pay for the use of a room for three or four days. We would like to have the matter made a little plainer.

Among other improvements to be made at Waterloo is a new flouring mill. Calvin Crane who owns so much of the orignal town site has given the land needed. It is a plat 112 feet east and west and 200 feet north and south, located right along the Lake Shore road so as to be easily accessible to the tracks. The land is where Si Look's ice house used to stand near the tracks and east across Washington street from the old site of the freight house of the Lake Shore road. It will be a good location, and the town greatly needs a flouring mill.

The most Popular.

A canvass among the druggists of this place reveals the fact that Chamberlain's are the most popular proprietary medicines sold. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, especially, is regraded as in the lead of all throat trouble remedies, and as such, is freely prescribe by physicians. As a croup medicine, it is also unexcelled, and most families with young children keep a bottle always handy for instant use. The editor of the Graphic has repeatedly known Chamberlain's Cough Remedy to do the work after all other medicines had failed.—The Kimball S. D. Graphic. For sale at 25 and 50 cents per bottle by F. E. Davenport.

St. Joe News: The DAILY COURIER at Auburn is a year old, and we are glad to know that it is on a permanent footing and will be continued. May it live long and prosper.

Mrs. J. E. Hall of Cheboygan Mich., arrived on the Lake Shore train yesterday afternoon for a visit with numerous relatives in Auburn. Mrs. Hall was formerly Miss Della Hough and is is well know to many here.

—It is claimed that New York State will not send to St. Louis a solid delegation for its favorite son, Gov. Morton. It is believed that several delegates will favor McKinley.

Philadelphia is going to build one of the largest public halls in the country, one that will seat 15,000 people. It is to be a rival to the "Madison Square Garden" of New York, and the "Coliseum" at Chicago, and like these two, will be a permanent structure.

—A great many people are influenced by what others do, and that is one of the reasons why so many take Simmons Liver Regulator. "I was suffering greatly from Chills and Fever and the more quinine I took the worse I felt. I was told of of Simmons Liver Regulator, by a friend in Arkansas, and I didn't need to take much of it before I was entirely relieved."—Byron Bradley, Tallahassee, Fla.

—It is now a well known fact, the Gen Harrison does not favor the nomination of the McKinley. The ex-president thinks McKinley is the leader of the movement for higher tariff rates, and that it is not what the country needs. It is just possible that he believes the wisest plan would be to nominate a certain ex-president, who is conceded to have made a fairly respectable success of his administration.

Taxpaying is getting quite lively, as farmers especially like to get such matters off their hands before spring work begins. The roads are not so bad but what they can get to town, and then when the spring opens they will be ready to start things in good shape. We are pleased to see some of them remember the COURIER when they are in town.

Condensed Testimony.

Chas. B. Hood, Brooker and Manufacturer's Agents, Columbus, Ohio, certifies that Dr. King's New Discovery has no equal as a Cough remedy. J. D. Brown, Prop. St. James Hotel, Fort Wayne, Ind., testifies that he was cured of a Cough of two years standing, caused by LaGrippe, by Dr. King's New Discovery. B. F. Merrill, Baldwinville, Mass., says that he has used and recommended it and never knew it to fail and would rather have it than any doctor, because it cures. Fred Brooks on Trial for Attempt to Kill Wm. Lower.

Tuesday's Daily.

(CONCLUDED FROM FIRST PAGE.)

Had my pipe in my right hand. Got a wound in my left hand. Did not intend to kill Lower. I was on now track. I intended to give him a good licking, but did not go there for that purpose. But he had insulted me so many times. Had you not said repeatedly, that you would whip him, if he did not quit insulting you? Ans., Yes and I meant it. This was less than a week. Felon had been on my thumb about four weeks. I did not strike Lower first. He struck me in breast. I wanted him to take back the insult but I had nothing against him. He admitted he had a few days before threatened him, but had not very much against him. (Lower.) Does not remember that he told that Lower had got to take back the lies he had told. When I had him down, I kicked him twice in left side. He was on his knees, not on hands and knees. He was about a step away, when I recognized him, I said nothing, to him, was talking to the ladies about church and about the minister.

Marion Goodrich and his wife were both recalled, and attempts made to show they had disagreed about the matter of testimony, but nothing new was brought out. He thought Mr. Metzger's reputation for truth not good, and did not seem to like Brooks.

Wm. Masters called, and testified he considered Mrs. Metzger's reputation for truth was bad. Lives near them.

Elsworth Hamilton called. Reputation for truth and veracity of Mrs. Metzger not good. Not unfriendly with them but know they lied to injure Brooks' reputation bad.

Henry Shellhouse called. Did not like to testify against the reputation of his neighbors, but finally admitted Mrs. Metzger's reputation for truth was not good.

Daniel Rader, testified about the same way.

Zach Row was the last witness and testified to about the same thing.

Then came the pleas of attorneys which were good, and ended with at the speech of Mr. Phillips about nine o'clock. The jury were instructed and retired. About one in the morning they had agreed on a verdict.

At nine a. m. this, Tuesday, morning when court convened, the jury handed the judge their verdict, which was "Guilty of assault and battery, and sentence, 30 days in the county jail and $100 fine."

To those who had heard the testimony, this was considered too light a sentence for so grave an offense, at least the majority of those we heard talk, expressed themselves that way. Of course, Brooks, who had reason to expect two years in the pen, is happy.

Illustrating the mind's training, a Southern paper tells of a little girl, 4 years old, who happened to be sliding on the ice, when she suddenly fell heavily and was evidently badly hurt. At the sound of her sobs a friend rushed to her assistance and caught her in her arms. "You poor little thing, and how did you fall?" The mite raised her head and replied between her sobs: "Vertically." So much for kindergarten training.

A most curious question as to what constitutes a libel has just been raised in England. It is whether a blank page, with a man's name at the top, and the words, "What I think about it," constitutes a libel. The learned counsel who have been consulted take opposing views, and in order to avoid possible embarrassing complications it has been assumed by those interested that the affirmative answer is correct. The question is not likely to reach the courts at present, but there is no telling but that it may come up again and be the subject of a ponderous decision.

Architects and builders have long been aware of the fact that bridges and buildings of all kinds expand in summer and contract in winter, but no scientific observations were ever made on that score until quite recently. Experiments made on tall monuments in both this country and Europe during the heat of the past summer, show that the perpendicularity of such structures is badly affected by the rays of the sun. At one time the Washington monument was found to lean nine inches out of plumb. This peculiarity, it was said, was due to the greater expansion of the side upon which the sun's rays fell.

Among the most cruel of hopes have been those which science has held out to consumptives. From time to time cures have been announced, only to prove failures. That dread consumption can be cured, there is no doubt; and that its cure will ultimately be discovered is equally certain. Let us hope that the well-known physician, Dr. Cyrus Edson, of New York, has already discovered it, as he and other medical men believe that he has. His remedy is a purified preparation of carbolic acid, which, hyperdermically injected into the blood, destroys, it is claimed, not only the germs of consumption, but of many other diseases. If "aseptolin" will do what Dr. Edson believes it will do, it is a discovery whose importance has never been exceeded in all the history of medical science.

Mr. Charles Jones, Consul of the United States at Crefeld, Germany, reports that it would not be a difficult matter to effect a large increase in our exports to Rhenish Prussia. Those exports now are insignificant in amount, while the Crefeld consular district alone sends each year an average of nearly four million dollars' worth of material to the United States. Mr. Jones thinks that if samples of American goods were properly exhibited abroad the result would be decidedly to the advantage of our industries, and he offers to exhibit in suitable apartments connected with the consulate at Crefeld such sample articles as American merchants, manufacturers, inventors, artists, and others may desire to submit to the favorable consideration of foreign merchants and consumers. He intimates that a reading-room might be provided in connection with the display, in which all export, commercial, trade and scientific journals could be conveniently arranged for the use of readers desiring information in regard to American products. The idea seems to be a good one. It undoubtedly would assist in placing more of our goods on foreign markets.

The London Spectator has an article on the prevailing restlessness of nations, in which it speaks of a probability that some sort of disastrous explosion among them is near at hand. It refers to the development of socialism in France and also in Germany. The German Emperor cannot be quiet, and dreams that he is to be "the child of the centuries." Russia has feverish symptoms and still oppresses the Jews; Italy is not happy, and Turkey is inflamed with its old murderous passions. Americans are said to be about to forego old policies and mix in the politics of the world. In England, "with all her external calm," there are uneasiness, resentments, and unsettled points in economics. Whether these phases of emotion will pass off harmlessly remains to be seen. There is a possibility of furious wars and "a very small match just now would fire the magazine." The Spectator is at least mistaken about the United States. It is asking for nothing that has been denied since the administration of Monroe.

In an article in the American Journal of Sociology Miss Jane Addams, of Chicago, says a few words about the domestic-servant problem which women employers would do well to heed. In brief, Miss Addams finds that a predominant cause of the ordinary domestic servant's misfortunes and of her mistress' dissatisfaction is her utter isolation. The young woman working in a factory at a small wage and paying for her board at least preserves not only a few hours of liberty, but the right to mingle with others of her class. Whether or not she belongs to an organization or club of other working-girls, she has a well-defined social and economic status. She tries herself and her condition by that of her companions. Miss Addams points out very shrewdly that when one of these employes is reproved by an angry foreman she knows perfectly well the opinion of several other girls as to the justice or injustice of the reprimand. In other words, the factory girl or shop girl is sustained and guided by a sort of public sentiment among her own co-workers. In the case of the household employe there is nothing of this. She is absolutely isolated and if her mistress be capricious or unreasonable there is no court of appeal even for sympathy. The family in which she works is, of course, predisposed to assume that there is only one side to the question, and the employe has to accept this arbitrary common judgment as despotic law. This is a spirit-breaking proceeding, even if the despotism be kindly. What the domestic employe needs, in Miss Addams' opinion, is opportunities for a fuller social and corporate life. She is in need of fellowship—not merely the fellowship of gayety and an occasional outing, but the establishment of a new social status whereby she and her sister-workers may be made to feel that they are in true relation to the rest of humanity. This is a demand of the tendency of the times, and, whether it is to be gained by organization or by some other means, it must be met. The "household industry" must be brought into relation with the rest of the working world, and, as Miss Addams intimates, the domestic employe will recover her happiness and be a better worker in the day when the "servant attitude," in which she is now placed, is abolished and the natural and rational relationship of employer and employe is substituted instead.

CANADA'S LIBERAL LEADER.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a Noted Man in the Dominion.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the noted leader of the Liberal party in the dominion, is an able man. He was born in the province of Quebec in 1842, and was educated in the college of L'Assomption. He afterward took the degree of B. C. L. at McGill University in Toronto. He studied law and was called to the bar of lower Canada in 1865. In 1880 he was appointed queen's counsel. He has had a brilliant career in the dominion house of commons. He first attracted attention to himself as an orator in a great speech on the Riel question at the time of the rebellion in the northwestern territories. It was at the dead of night, when the house was tired out and sleepy. But the flood of eloquence he poured forth, the mighty power he disclosed, roused the members to the fact that a new force was among them, and his success as a leader was assured from that moment. Laurier is a tall, slender man, and in the very prime of his physical and mental power. He speaks French and

CUBA'S GREAT CURSE.

HIGH TAXES THE CAUSE OF THE REVOLUTION.

Forced to Buy Goods from Spain Which Might Be Bought Cheaper in This Country—McKinleyites' False Colors.

How Cuba Is Oppressed.

The evil effects of high tariff taxes have a practical illustration in the system of "protection" by which Spain forces the people of Cuba to pay much higher taxes on American goods than on those of Spanish origin. In the earlier history of Cuba its ports were closed to foreign commerce, Spain reserving for herself the entire trade. Laws prohibited the raising of wheat and potatoes, which were supplied by Spain. In 1818 the ports of the island were opened to foreign trade, but in 1882 a new tariff was enacted which lowered the duties on all Spanish products and at the same time increased the rates on all other merchandise, so as to practically prohibit its importation.

As an example of the changes that were introduced may be cited the case of steel rails, which, under the old tariff, were charged 6 per cent. on a valuation of $25 per ton, while in the new tariff they were subject to a duty of $22 per ton. Iron, according to the previous tariff, paid $1.30 per 100 kilos, and under the new $2.65. A hundred kilos of cotton prints from Spain pay $2.67; from the United States $47.26. A hundred kilos of cotton hosiery, if from Spain, pay $10.95; if from the United States, $195. One thousand kilos of sugar bags, if from Spain, pay $4.69; if from the United States, $82.50. One hundred kilos of cashmere goods, if from Spain, pay $15.47; if from the United States, $300.

The discrimination between the Spanish and foreign merchandise varies from 250 per cent. to 60 per cent., and in some cases runs as high as 2,000 per cent., and the trader must pay in addition 10 per cent. for charges.

Under this arrangement Spain imports various products and manufactures and then sends them to Cuba, her middlemen making a profit, before the goods are transhipped to the West Indian colony, where they must pay another duty. Thus it is impossible for the Spanish merchant to import jute bags from England and export them to Cuba as a Spanish product. Again, American wheat is bought in New York, sent to Santander or to Barcelona, there to be converted into flour, and a large profit made by the exporter, who sends it to Cuba as a Spanish flour.

The exports of Spain to Cuba have reached the figure of about $28,000,000 per annum. At least three-quarters of this amount, it is estimated, would be purchased by Cuba in the United States at an advantage of no less than 20 per cent. if the tariff did not stand in the way. On this basis the United States are annually deprived of a commerce amounting to $17,000,000 or $18,000,000, on which a profit of at least $1,500,000 would be realized.

On the other hand, 80 per cent. of the total products of Cuba are consumed in the United States, and there is a direct export tax on sugar and tobacco amounting to over $1,000,000, which the Government of Spain, through its tariff arrangement, compels the American consumer to pay into its treasury. This is the visible contribution, but as those products, as well as all the others, are taxed in various other indirect ways, the consumers in this country are affected further to an extent that cannot be reduced to figures.

Speaking on this subject, a well-informed Cuban of New York City said: "Whatever advantages this country might derive from its commerce with Cuba are practically absorbed by the Spanish Government through its tariff arrangements. The Cubans have suffered so much from the effect of the high tariff that to a unit they are against it, and there is no doubt that one of the first steps taken by the Government of the republic of Cuba, should the revolution triumph, would be to lower the rates at least 75 or 80 per cent., and this would mean an immediate increase of commerce of the United States with Cuba of $14,000,000 or $16,000,000.

"Spain knows that emancipation of the island would mean a great loss to her manufacturers and merchants, for the whole commerce of Cuba will come to the United States, and that is one of the reasons why she is making her great efforts to continue her rule there."

Under False Colors.

The best evidence that the McKinleyites are afraid to discuss their robber system on its merits, is found in their constant appeals to national pride under the pretense that they are the only true Americans. By asserting that protection means patriotism they seek to delude the public into ignoring the evil effects of high taxation, for the sake of the pretended interests of the nation as a whole. It should be clear to even the most partisan Republican that it must be a very poor cause which cannot stand on its own merits. If a high tariff cannot be justified by its effect on trade and industry, it is useless to try and bolster it up with false pretenses of "Americanism." The real test should be: Do high taxes benefit the people? If not, it has no reason for existence.

The Wool Tariff.

A number of the newspapers that have been clamoring for the reimposition of a duty upon wool and a higher duty upon worsted and woolen goods have pointed to the large importations of fabrics manufactured from wool during the year 1895, when compared with similar importations in 1894, as a warranty for this action. It would seem hardly necessary to say that the year 1894 was not one which can be fairly taken for a contrast, for the reason that it was a period of extreme trade depression, during which purchases for consumption fell off to a surprising extent, and also, in anticipation of the reduced duty, importations that would ordinarily have been made were held back to await the time when a lower range of duty would take effect. For this reason quite a part of the importations of 1895 were simply meant to replace the vacancy caused by the non-importations of the previous year, and, allowing for this, it may be doubted whether the regular imports of this class during the last year were any larger than the normal imports. We imagine this fact will be brought out clearly enough in the returns for the year 1896, and that our high tariff friends will then be called upon to explain the reason why the imports of worsted and woolen goods of the year 1895 were so much larger than those of the year we are now entering upon. What they have not done thus far has been to make an explanation of how it is that so much wool, domestic and foreign, has been purchased and used by the American manufacturers in the last twelve months than normal purchases and consumptions in years that have gone by, if they have not had a greatly enlarged demand for goods of their own manufacture. It is hardly probable that manufacturers have purchased wool for the purpose of burning it up, and it is clear that if they have used it, the production of woolen and worsted fabrics in the United States during the year 1895 has been much larger than their production in any twelve other months in the history of this country.—Boston Herald.

The Balance-of-Trade Argument.

The McKinleyite press is greatly worried over the alleged danger that our imports of foreign goods may exceed in value our exported products. It is claimed that increased imports are an evidence of unsound trade conditions, and the country is warned that unless the tariff is raised to the prohibitory point, terrible things will happen to American industry.

The balance-of-trade scare is an old protectionist trick. If there are any persons who are still frightened by it they have only to apply the same argument to the trade of their city or State, to see that it is wholly a high-tariff delusion. Suppose that Rhode Island should annually receive from the other States products worth $10,000,000 more than the exports from that State. Would that be a bad thing for the people of Rhode Island? Would it mean that they were being ruined by an adverse balance of trade? Or would it not be a decided benefit to the people who were getting more things than they gave? It is true that they might have to pay for them some time, but payment would have to be made in labor products, thus equalizing exports and imports. No one could possibly be injured because they received more than the value of what they exported.

Trade between the various political divisions of the earth is carried on on the same principles as between the American States. That Europe, Asia or Africa should send us more goods than we give them cannot in any way hurt us. If they are foolish enough to continue giving more than they get, our people will gain. If they demand the balances due them they must take our products in payment. In either case we profit by the exchange of our surplus goods for theirs. And the greater the amount of wealth we can secure abroad in return for the smallest quantity of goods, the richer will the country become.

Get the Foreign Markets.

The State Department has furnished a volume of statistical reports on our foreign commercial relations, and in transmitting it, the Secretary of State says: "The recent increase in the percentage of exports of manufactured articles as compared with the table of our exports seems to indicate that the United States stand on the threshold of a great development of this important branch of international trade, and the conclusion arrived at from the general view of the world's commercial and industrial activity, submitted herewith, is that what is most needed to hasten this development is energetic action on the part of our manufacturers and exporters."

Now is the golden time for our manufacturers to secure the foreign markets. The Wilson tariff has given them many free raw materials, and they are now in their best condition to compete with foreign products. That some of them are alive to their advantages is shown by the export figures of 1895, which show that domestic manufactures exceeded by over $17,000,000 the like exports in any previous year of American history. The markets are for those who work for them, and American pluck and enterprise should not be found wanting.—Rome (N. Y.) Sentinel.

Protection's Fruits.

The advocates of what they call the "American" policy of high taxes and trade-prohibition, are not fair toward the country from which they stole their pet idea. China had a perfect system of "protection" for two thousand years, rigidly excluding not only foreign goods, but the pauper labor of Europe and America as well. And the results of their selfish policy of trade exclusion are seen in the stagnation of the Chinese people. Wages are lower than in any other country in the world. Modern means of transportation, communication and production are practically unknown. The great bulk of the people live close to the point of starvation. Physically and mentally they are inferior to all other civilized races. Will our protectionists explain why their system has had these effects where it has been fully tested for so many centuries?

The People Who Complain.

The chief grievance of the Republicans against the Wilson tariff is that prices of goods have fallen since the McKinley law was repealed. If the coming Presidential campaign is to be fought over the issue of cheap versus dear goods, the Democrats are willing that the Republicans shall have the votes of all who complain that prices are too low, if only those who want things cheap will support the Democratic ticket. A division on these lines will show that it is the manufacturers who want to make goods dearer by high taxes on them, while the great mass of the people want low prices.

WORSE THAN DEATH.

HOW CAPTURED CUBAN REBELS ARE PUNISHED.

Terrible Tortures that Await Luckless Insurgents in Spanish Prisons—Shackled and Walled Up in Damp Dungeons and Left to Rot and Die.

Cells Are Living Tombs.

The desperation of the Cubans who are fighting Spain for the liberty of their island excites wonder at times in the American mind, and some are inclined to thing them too bloodthirsty in their system of warfare. It is true, very little quarter is given the Spanish soldiery in any of the conflicts where the insurgents have the upper hand, but there is a good, substantial reason for this seeming heartlessness.

The soldiers of the insurgent army know that a fate blacker than death will be their allotment if they fall. The kingdom of Spain has never displayed a gentle hand to its enemies. Dark echoes of the inquisition permeate its treatment of malefactors, for as such the Cuban insurgents are regarded. The prison system of Spain is more barbarous to-day than that of either Turkey or Russia, and that is saying a good deal.

For more than a thousand years the Spaniards have made a study of torture, and the long accumulation of knowledge handed from one generation to another, and elaborated on by each, makes their prisons the worst on earth. There are men forgotten and unnamed rotting away in the Spanish dungeons to-day, under conditions more horrible than that pictured by Dickens in his Tale of Two Cities, in the character of the old doctor confined in the Bastile for twenty-five years. Men who took part in the previous Cuban rebellion, nearly a generation ago, may still be living in the dungeons. Thirty years hence some of the men who are now fighting so valiantly in Cuba may be rotting away in the same pest holes. It is this prospect which makes them desperate and bloodthirsty, and eager to accept a thousand risks to shake off the torture which awaits them.

Each week batches of Cuban suspects are forwarded to Spain. To be a suspect is equivalent to being guilty, and those who go will, in all probability, never return. If a wealthy planter is suspected of furnishing financial aid to the insurgents he is pounced upon and shipped off. Infinitely better would have been his fate if he had joined the insurgent army and been killed on the field of battle. The ordinary suspect is not executed, but if he be proved guilty of treason the garrote will speedily end his troubles. The garrote is the official form of capital punishment in Spain. Nearly all of the death sentences are executed in the Pradera de la Ysidro, in Madrid. All executions are public, and are usually held early in the morning. The criminal is always mounted upon the back of a tiny Spanish donkey and goes to the place of execution in a procession which consists of citizens, priests and soldiers. Prior to leaving the prison in which the condemned has been confined, mass is celebrated, and the death sentence is read to the guilty wretch. When the prisoner reaches the place of execution, he mounts a scaffold, and he is manacled to a chair. Then around his neck is placed the band of the garrote. Two turns of a powerful thumb-screw crush the neck of the victim, and almost sever the head from the body. Death is claimed to be absolutely instantaneous.

The political prisoner fares worse than the criminal guilty of assassination. Most of the political prisoners are sent to Ceuta, Africa. Ceuta is an old Moorish seaport town in Morocco, opposite Gibraltar. The town is on the side of the ancient mountain, Abyla, which forms one of the Pillars of Hercules, the Rock of Gibraltar being the other. It is almost impregnable, and is to Spain what Siberia is to Russia, with the exception that it is even more horrible. The town was built by the Moors about 945, and it is probable that there is no other place in the world where so many devices of torture are concentrated.

Ceuta is a very small place and the Moors constructed a chain of fortresses around it to guard against any possible attack. It is in the center of these ancient and decaying fortresses that the dungeons are located. They are hewn out of the solid rock, and are in tiers to a depth of fifty or sixty feet. The approach to them is made through narrow openings in the stone floors of the fortresses, and when the horrible hole is opened the foul odor of filth and decomposition is overpowering. These dungeons are inhabited almost solely by political prisoners, and many Cubans arrested during the present rebellion are there. Some are in solitary confinement. Others are in dungeons holding thirty or forty men.

When a man is placed in solitary confinement, a hole it cut in the masonry large enough to admit the passage of his body, and he is dropped in. A blacksmith follows and welds on the fetters. Locks and keys are never used. A heavy weight with a chain is welded about the waist. A chain attached to the latter is welded to an iron ring sunk in the wall of solid rock. The hole in the masonry is bricked up again with the exception of a small space a few inches square. Through this comes the scant air and the scraps of food allowed the victim.

After that the man is left to live or rot. The filth of these holes cannot be adequately described. Death is merciful here, for few men survive the torture for any length of time.

WOULD ENDURE NO SLIGHTS.

British Ambassadors Brought Eastern Potentates to Their Senses.

Lord Cromer, the artillery major who represents the queen at Cairo, would never have permitted an oriental potentate such as the sultan to keep him waiting for more than an hour in an ice-cold room, exposed to the sneers of the palace officials, as the sultan is reported to have done with Sir Philip Currie, who now lies ill a-bed in consequence of the cold which he caught. Lord Cromer is a tall, powerful man, and years ago, when calling upon the Sheik-el-Bekri, the supreme ecclesiastical dignitary of the Mohammedan church in Egypt, when the latter presumed to receive him without rising from his divan and merely negligently extending him hand, Lord Cromer, or Major Baring, as he was then, caught hold of ithe sheik's hand and with a sudden jerk pulled the astonished dignitary off the divan and on to his feet, squeezing his hand with such force that the Turk simply writhed, Baring all the while overwhelming him with compliments, his face wreathed in the most friendly of smiles. The lesson was a good one and after that no oriental dignitary, from the khedive downward, ever dared to render himself guilty of any lack of respect for the doughty major.

Nor would Lord Stanley, who while ambassador at Constantinople was known as the Great Elchee, ever condescend to wait in the ante-chamber of the sultan, or of anyone else for the matter of that. He had far too lofty a sense of what was due both to his office and to the sovereign whom he represented, and on one memorable occasion when he had been kept waiting for a couple of minutes he deliberately stalked past the chamberlain and pashas and strode into the sultan's presence with his dragoman unannounced, the sultan being far too startled by the angry mien of the ambassador to protest against the intrusion.

In order to fully appreciate the slight put by the present sultan upon Sir Philup Currie, it must be remembered that the ambassador of a monarchial country is officially regarded as the personal representative of his sovereign and entitled to much the same treatment that would be accorded to the latter. Thus at European courts when there is any official banquet, the ambassadors and their wives (though not the mere ministers plenipotentiary) have a right to seats at the high table reserved exclusively for the personages of royal and imperial rank. The sultan has, therefore, been guilty of a piece of discourtesy not merely to Sir Philip, but to Queen Victoria herself, the indignity being rendered the more acute by reason of the fact that the ambassador was the bearer of an autograph letter from the queen to the sultan.—New York World.

Once a Cook, Now Premier.

The son of a cook is now Premier of Austria. His name is Casimir Felix Badeni, and thus far in life he has basked in the sunshine of fortune's smile. His luck began two years before he was born, when his father, who had been a very good cook, was created a count. The title was at the time an empty honor, for the distinguished chef had so little money that he could not live with the necessary dignity. For a time it looked as though his two sons would be compelled to toil for a living, but luck again came to their rescue. Their mother's brother, Count Mier, had married the famous German actress, Anna Wierer, and this childless lady became so attached to the two Badeni boys that she bequeathed to them her entire fortune. Thus relieved of the necessity of earning a competence by their own efforts, Count Badeni procured an excellent education, was graduated as doctor of philosophy and entered the Austrian civil service. He was genial in manner, had a great deal of money to spend and was not averse to spending it, and he soon made himself the most popular Pole at the court of Vienna. In 1871 he became district chief of Zolkiew and two years later entered the ministry of the interior. In 1888 he was made governor of Galicia, an office he held until he was recently appointed prime minister of Austria by Emperor Franz Joseph. He is said to be worth $2,500,000, but his younger brother, who has succeeded him as governor of Galicia, has been more conservative in his expenditure, and is credited with being the fortunate possessor of considerably over $10,000,000.—Pearson's Weekly.

Tallest Person in the World.

Probably the tallest human being in the world is Miss Ella Ewing, who is known as the Missouri giantess. She stands 8 feet 4 inches in height, being two inches taller than Chang, the famous Chinese giant. Miss Ewing is but 23 years of age.

Bad Statesmen to Sell.

"You, sir," shouted the reformer, "you are no statesman."

"Statesman?" echoed the boss, laughing harshly. "I got statesmen to sell."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

THE QUEEN OF ITALY.

Most Beautiful, Cultured, Gracious and Loveliest Queen in the World.

Marguerite of Savoy, Queen of Italy, is not only the most beautiful queen in all the world, but the most cultured, gracious and loveliest as well. Marguerite Teresa Maria Giovanna was born on Nov. 20, 1851. Her father was Ferdinand, Duke of Genoa, who died when she was 4 years old; her mother is a sister of the present King of Saxony. Italy's queen is not domestic. She loves fashions, letters, art. She is fond of sovereignty and the endless work of social duty and patronage it involves. She is fitted physically for these things, for her face is beautiful, her figure tall and aristocratic, her hair a delight in chestnut brown, her arms and shoulders perfect, her movements full of grace, her manner, ever dignified, always charming. She knows French, German, English, Spanish, Italian, of course, and Latin thoroughly. She knows Greek well and is familiar with the literature of all ages. The queen rises early and retires late. She manages with six hours' sleep and thrives on it. Her work of charities, patronage, organization and society keeps her constantly busy. She is not at all domestic. She likes driving and out of door life generally, but has not much opportunity for indulgence in these tastes. She likes Germany and the Germans and is a warm friend of William and his wife. In Rome she takes an intense interest in the court social life; in her country place at Monza she is a country woman; in the Alps she is as hardly a climber as the Tyrolese, going over glaciers, along narrow paths or to the edge of a precipice with charming indifference. She is a great lover of flowers, fine old lace and rare pearls.

BETTER THAN A BOAT.

Life Preserver that Can Save a Large Number of People.

The ever-present danger of the sea—dangers illustrated almost daily by accounts of collision, fire or other disaster, so often attended with loss of life—have prompted the invention of many more or less ingenious life-saving devices. One of the simplest, and yet most valuable, is that lately introduced by William Brandt at Lubeck, Germany.

Substantially it is a reproduction, on a very large scale, of the life-saving belts or rings commonly found aboard ships. But, besides its greater carrying capacity, it presents some novel and sensible features, which enhance its value. Numerous partitions divide the belt into water-tight compartments, so that damage to any part does not materially affect the efficiency of the whole. The great elasticity of the belt reduces the danger of damage to a minimum.

Despite its great size it is very light. One man can easily roll it along the deck and fling it overboard. It does not matter how it strikes the water—it invariably turns right side up. The middle space is taken up by a strong network. An important addition is that of ropes made fast to the periphery of the belt, and kept afloat by corks, so that persons several yards away from the buoy can draw themselves to it. Seven large men standing on it don't appreciably sink the device, and when it is considered how small the weight of a person partially supported by the water is it will be seen that one belt can save a large number of people.

A Princess Who Is a Sixfooter.

The Crown Princess of Denmark is the tallest royal lady in Europe, her height being over 6 feet 2 inches. She is a granddaughter of Mlle. Desiree Clary, who was the first sweetheart of Napoleon Bonaparte. They quarreled, and Mlle. Clary married Bernadotte, who eventually became king of Norway and Sweden. Napoleon always remembered his old sweetheart with affection, and helped her husband out of one or two political snarls for Desiree's sake. The Crown Princess of Denmark is the richest as well as the tallest European princess, she having inherited a fortune of $25,000,000 from her maternal grandfather, Prince Frederick of the Netherlands, in addition to the fortune left her by her father.

The burglar climbed over the office partition. "It is well to be on the safe side," he said. Then he began work on the vault.—Chicago Evening Post.

DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:

"I cannot begin to tell you what your remedies have done for me. I suffered for years with falling and neuralgia of the womb, kidney trouble and leucorrhœa in its worst form. There were times that I could not stand, was sick all over and in despair. I had not known a real well day for 15 years. I knew I must do something at once. I had tried physicians without receiving any lasting benefit. I began the use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Now, I have used 9 bottles; my weight has increased 25 lbs. I tell every one to whom and what I owe my recovery, and there are 15 of my friends taking the Compound after seeing what it has done for me. Oh, if I had known of it sooner, and saved all these years of misery. I can recommend it to every woman."—KATE YONER, 408 W. 9th St., Cincinnati, O.

Should advice be required, write to Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass., who has the utter confidence of all intelligent American women. She will promptly tell what to do, free of charge. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, which is easily obtained at any druggist's, will restore any ailing woman to her normal condition quickly and permanently.

Syrup of Figs

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills, which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge, that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, laxatives or other remedies are then not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

Made His Escape.

"Pat" Alexander, to whom "Shirley" makes reference in his memoirs, on one occasion met Dr. William Chambers on the North Bridge, Edinburgh, and asked him, excitedly: "Have you found her?"

"Found whom?"

"That woman you were advertising for."

"Woman! I haven't been advertising for any woman."

"Oh, yes; here it is," and from his waistcoat pocket he extracted a soiled advertisement clipped out of the Scotsman. The doctor took it and read: "Wanted—A woman to clean Chambers." When he looked for Alexander, that gentleman had disappeared—wisely, perhaps.

A Rash Promise.

A story is told of a London magistrate who had a London lady up before him the day after Christmas, whom the policeman said he had found tipsy. He told her he would let her go, considering the festive season, if she would promise never to enter a public house again.

"But, your honor," said the lady, "I was not drunk; I was drugged."

"Well," said the magistrate, who saw that she was fencing, "I'll let you go if you will promise never to enter a drug store again."

To save the fine she promised and departed. All her soda water is gone.

Beats a Good Wife.

Courtship and marriage are recognized as targets for witticisms, of which Mr. Punch's famous "Don't" is undoubtedly the most famous example of a happy answer. Most of them are of the same cynical character. A careworn divine is reported to have said, in reply to the ecstatic declaration of an intending Benedict that "nothing in the world beats a good wife."

"Oh, yes; a bad husband often does and—vice versa!"

"The Wooden Hen."

The illustration shown herewith is small in size, but really large when we consider that the "Wooden Hen" is no larger than a live hen, yet has double the capacity. It weighs only 15 pounds, has a capacity of 22 eggs, and while not a toy, is just as amusing, besides being instructive as well.

We suggest that every reader of this write Mr. Geo. H. Stahl, Quincy, Ill., and ask for a copy of his handsome little booklet "C," describing the "Wooden Hen;" also his large catalogue of the Model Excelsior Incubator. All sent free. Mention this paper.

The Ideal Salesman.

A prize essay on the successful salesman says: "He must be enthusiastic! He will never be fully successful until he thinks his business is the best thing in earth! He must be true to his trade and earnest in his avocation. It is scarcely necessary for me to urge the importance of increasing his ability by learning all that is to be learned in the business, even to the minutest detail. The salesman should be an expert in the examination of his own goods. He should never represent a weave or fabric until he is sure of what he is handling. When he is himself cheated, his customer likewise is swindled. Once understanding his business the salesman starts out on the pathway of success."

Subduing a Murderer.

Dr. Cyrus Falconer, who recently died at the age of 85, was a distinguished physician of Hamilton, Ohio. He was a trenchant fighter against every form of wrong, and his presence and character commanded deference, even from desperate men. The Interior gives an example of this power:

The Doctor had been active in the prosecution of the assassin and desperado, Tom McGeehan, who, though he murdered not less than six men, could not be convicted, and finally was shot to death by a vigilance committee. The assassin swore vengeance against the Doctor, and soon after, fully armed, met him on the highway.

"Dr. Falconer," said the assassin, "do you know that I am going to kill you?"

The Doctor noticed that his assailant was deadly pale. "Tom," said the Doctor, "you know me well enough to know that I am not afraid of you, that you cannot frighten me. Now what do you mean.

The two stood in silence, the assassin's hand in his side coat-pocket. In a moment the Doctor noticed with great relief the color coming into Tom's face, which quickly deepened into crimson. "Then I knew I was safe," said the Doctor, "and I proceeded to give Tom such a lecture as he never heard before."

A Model Citizen.

If anybody wants a model for a citizen of the highest class he may find it in this eulogy of a Boston man, written by a friend who was worth having: "Martin Brimmer, freed from private care, dedicated himself to the commonweal, he took his part in legislation, in charities, in education, in cultivation of art. He mingled in all public affairs; not only mingled, but led. Nature had made him prepossessing. His dignity, his deliberation, his reserve were imposing, his gentle courtesy was winning; and when at last he uttered a few pregnant words in a judicial tone, the majority of his hearers fancied that he was but expressing their sentiments, while the minority decided that opposition was in vain. The fusion was complete.

Searchlights as Riot Quellers.

The electric searchlight was used recently to put down a riot in Lancashire, England. A manufacturer whose men had struck, was determined to keep his mill going, and he promptly secured new hands and set them to work. At the same time he fixed a searchlight on the factory building, to prevent the strikers from setting fire to the sheds erected for the new hands. During the continuance of the strike this light was used nightly, in conjunction with the police established in the works, to scour the country and to illuminate the parts where pickets were placed. It was found so effective that a large number of temporary police were dispensed with.

RIPANS TABULES

Mr. Charles S. Patterson, the publisher of Newspaperdom, says that it is not often that he gets so enthusiastic as he does over Ripans Tabules. Almost with the regularity of clockwork he used to feel, at about eleven o'clock, that something had gone wrong with his breakfast; especially was this true if he had had a restless night, as is no uncommon thing with headworkers. "My stomach," said Mr. Patterson, "is under the standard as to strength, and it seems at these times to act only indifferently, and finally to stop. Clouds come before my vision and a slight nausea is felt. Then I reach out for my Ripans. (Years of the sort of thing related have made me know the symptoms as well as my name.) Down goes one of the blessed little concentrated boons, and in a few minutes the visual clouds lift, discomfort passes away, stomach apparently resumes operations, and at 12:30 or 1 o'clock I go out for my usual rather hearty luncheon—all in delightful contrast with my former practically ruined afternoons—that I sought to escape by fasting and various doses."

Ripans Tabules are sold by druggists, or by mail if the price (50 cents a box) is sent to The Ripans Chemical Company, No. 10 Spruce Street, New York. Sample vial, 10 cents.

$10,000 FOR WOMEN

$1,000 FOR THE ONE WHO GUESSES BEST!

A YEAR AGO THE CHICAGO RECORD offered $30,000 in cash prizes to authors for the best "stories of mystery." The stories were so called because it was required that a mystery should run through the entire story and be disclosed only in the last chapter, the purpose being to give CASH PRIZES to those readers of THE CHICAGO RECORD who should be able to solve the mystery, or come nearest to a correct solution of it, IN ADVANCE of the publication of the last chapter in the paper.

THE AWARD OF AUTHORS' PRIZES HAS JUST BEEN MADE.

Stories from all parts of the English-speaking world, to the number of 816, were entered in the competition. Twelve Cash Prizes were offered for the best twelve stories. The first prize was $10,000, and was won by Harry Stillwell Edwards, of Macon, Ga. His story is entitled:

"SONS AND FATHERS,"

AND ITS PUBLICATION WILL BEGIN IN THE CHICAGO RECORD ON MARCH 23, and continue in about thirty daily installments until completed. "SONS AND FATHERS" is beyond all question THE GREAT STORY OF THE YEAR. There will be an interval of a week or more between the publication of the last installment containing the explanation of the mystery and the immediately preceding chapter, during which period the guesses will be received by THE RECORD.

To still further promote popular interest in this remarkable story THE CHICAGO RECORD offers $10,000 in 880 cash prizes for the 880 guesses which shall come the nearest to being true and complete solutions of the mystery in the story.

THE $10,000 IS DIVIDED AS FOLLOWS:

For the reader from whom THE RECORD receives the most complete and correct solution in all its details of the entire mystery of the story, as it shall be disclosed in the last chapter when published	$1,000
For the second best solution	500
For the third best solution	300
For the fourth best solution	200
For the next 5 nearest best solutions, $100 each	500
For the next 10 nearest best solutions, 50 each	500
For the next 20 nearest best solutions, 25 each	500
For the next 50 nearest best solutions, 20 each	1,000
For the next 300 nearest best solutions, 10 each	3,000
For the next 500 nearest best solutions, 5 each	2,500
In all 880 prizes, amounting to	$10,000

FULL PARTICULARS as to the details of the conditions governing the awarding of these prizes will be published in THE CHICAGO RECORD. The principal rules are as follows:

1.—But one solution can be entered by a reader. It is immaterial whether the reader subscribes for the paper direct to the office of publication, or whether it is bought from the local newsdealer. The contest is open, under the specified conditions, to all who read the paper.

2.—The explanation of the mystery may be made in the reader's own words, in the English language, and without any attempt at "fine writing," simply giving as many of the facts that go to make a "complete and absolutely correct solution of the entire mystery" as the reader may be able to discover.

3.—The $10,000 will be awarded, under the conditions announced, according to the best judgment of the judges appointed by THE CHICAGO RECORD, and they will have complete control and final decision, beyond any appeal, in all matters relating to this unique contest.

And last, but not least,

ONLY WOMEN AND GIRLS MAY GUESS.

THE CHICAGO RECORD is pre-eminently a FAMILY NEWSPAPER, and its daily installment of a high-grade serial story is a feature intended to specially commend it to the home circle. To emphasize—and advertise—the fact that THE CHICAGO RECORD is a newspaper particularly suitable for woman's reading the further condition is made that the $10,000 in prizes shall be paid only for explanations or guesses sent in by women and girls. All may read, but only WOMEN AND GIRLS MAY GUESS.

SEND 10 CENTS AND GET THE RECORD 10 DAYS.

A SPECIAL OFFER.....

THE RECORD will be sent to any address, post-paid, for 10 days, beginning with the first chapter of the story, FOR 10 CENTS, in coin or postage stamps. The story begins March 23, and it is desirable that subscriptions should be received as far in advance of that date as possible, but all subscriptions on this special offer received up to April 1 will be filled, but none after April 1.

THE CHICAGO RECORD ... is Chicago's leading morning daily. In fact, with a single exception, it has the largest morning circulation in America—100,000 a day. It is a member of The Associated Press and "prints all the news from all the world." It is independent in politics and gives all political news with judicial impartiality, free from the taint of partisanship. It is Chicago's family newspaper. Prof. J. T. Hatfield, of the Northwestern University, writing to the Evanston (Ill.) Index, says:

"I have come to the firm conclusion, after a long test, and after a wide comparison with the journals of many states and countries, that THE CHICAGO RECORD comes as near being the ideal daily journal as we are for some time likely to find on these mortal shores."

The journalists' class paper, published in New York, called "Newspaperdom," says:

"There is no paper published in America that so nearly approaches the true journalistic ideal as THE CHICAGO RECORD."

Forward your subscription as early as possible, so that your name may be entered on the subscription list at once and the paper be sent you without any delay and in time for the opening chapters of THE RECORD'S GREAT $10,000 PRIZE STORY. Address

TURNBULL.

Harvest Song.

Oh, listen, and I'll sing to you
Of the binder that is the best:
It is the one that's made of steel,
And lighter than all the rest.
It is the finest binder
Made in this broad land,
And has the biggest bull wheel,
And can't sink in mud or sand.

CHORUS.—

This binder is a dandy,
And runs very light.
It binds all kinds of grain,
And binds it mighty tight.
The McCormick, is the bully,
I tell you it is fine,
I think I ought to know it,
Cause I sell it all the time.

McCormick was the first to build
A machine to cut the grain,
And ever since they built that one
They've not built one in vain.
Oh, don't you want to buy one,
They do it up so fine,
And when they get in a contest
They get there every time.

The boxes they are made so you
Can take up all the play,
And when it wears a little bit
You don't throw it away;
But tighten up your set screws
Until you have it tight,
And then she'll glide down through the the grain,
Oh, what a pretty sight.

The bolts are made with a square head,
So you can hold them tight;
The metal parts are made of steel,
Which makes it strong yet light.
Now, look it over carefully,
You'll see it can not choke,
And it's balanced up so evenly
'Twill cut without a yoke.

Oh, I'm glad you've come to get one!
Please, sir, just step in,
We'll load you up a steel machine
And then we'll take your tin;
And when you've used it all your life,
And can not labor more,
It still will cut and bind the grain
As it always did before.

Don't forget that we can save you money on Shelf Hardware, Stoves, Gasoline Stoves, Tinware Granite, Ironware, Cutlery, Doors, Sash, Paints, Oils, Glass, Washing Machines, Spray Pumps, Wood and Iron Pumps, Building Paper, Fence Wire, Steel Roofing. Etc.

A Western Maud Muller.

Miss Muller, so the gossips say,
Flirted in quite a shameless way;

But Maud, with a laugh, pronounced it fudge—
Yet we caught her wink at the ratty judge.

And the Judge—but we mention this sub rose—
Blushed up to the roots of his bulbous nose.

Still he craned his neck, and, in passing by,
Gave a sinister wink with his dexter eye.

Quoth Maud to herself, as on she passed,
"I've his royal nibs in tow at last;

"My mother shall wear a sealskin sacque—
My pa swing out in his broadcloth black;

"My brother shall sip his whisky skins,
And my sister revel in gay breastpins!"

Quoth the Judge, as he sauntered listless on,
"She's a rattling girl; You bet I'm gone!

"No doubt my last wife's ma will kick,
And my heirs cut up the very Nick;

"But, though I've known her a short, short spell,
You bet I'll have her in spite of"——well,

No matter his word—'twas short and stout,
And the name of the place that's now played out,

According to Beecher. Alack for all!
The maid and Judge ne'er wedded at all!

For he passed in his checks from too much gin;
And the maid grew long, and lank, and thin,

And eke, as her chances glimmered away,
She ceased to flirt and began te pray.

God pity the maid, and pity the Judge,
And these days of twaddle, and bosh, and fudge;

For, of all sad words from a heart bereft,
The saddest are these: "You bet I'm left."

Convention

Hon. J. D. Leighty Re Nominated by Acclamation for Congressman.

And C. D Law was Chosen Delegate to the St Louis Convention.

Auburn welcomed the big convention and its attendant delegates in its usual wholesouled style, with the biggest snowstorm of the year, although April is now but twelve days away. But Auburn and DeKalb county are always equal to the emergency. Our people are used to occasions like this and it is this disposition, that has made and ought to make, Auburn, the convention city of the district. Next after Ft. Wayne, we have the most railroads, the most convenient trains, the best hotels, the best Opera House, the best saloons and the most wideawake people. These things have all helped to make this meeting the spread eagle affair foreshadowed in our headlines.

The delegates, as noted yesterday, began to arrive on the afternoon trains and by the time the evening train had unloaded, one could see a sensible addition to our lively population. The hotels soon filled up, especially at the Swineford, were the leader, if we may use that term in a case where so many call them "bosses." Among the first to show up was Sol A. Wood, of Angola, who is chairman of this congressional district. Then there were Harry Hanna, C. E. Everett and a number of others from Ft. Wayne, L. W. Welker, H. C. Peterson and T. M. Eels, of Albion, and a dozen or so of our local political lights, including judge Penfield, I. M. Zent, J. L. Davis and others. At the Swineford there was a buzzing and consulting, a buttonholing and ear whispering one so often sees at these leading political hubbubs. The stormy weather confined them mostly indoors, though now and then one would seek the solitude of the street, and one in particular anxiously questioned a Daily reporter for direction to a drugstore. We directed him to the Fischler Pharmacy and he disappeared in the blinding storm. We wish right here to relieve Mr. Fischler of any unjust suspicion. The man was a leading republican, and so could not be suspected of seeking anything stronger that soda. In fact it was a case of stomach ache.

The delegates were generally intelligent looking men for men who were mixing in early politics. Most of them appeared well-to-do, and two or three, we are told, rejoice in the possession of a fair sized "barl." At all events they were dressed fairly well. All had overcoats and overshoes, and most of them had a greater or less amount of cash in their inside pockets, for long experience in the conditions of a convention had made them aware that hotel men and saloon men expect to deal on a cash basis, after the manner of McKinley's platform., i. e., "gold, silver and paper money." So they will leave no bills behind.

There was a private meeting of the advance delegates last evening at the Swineford. This is usual, for the men who come early are here for that purpose. They want to do the hard work of the convention before the overworked delegates arrive. In this way the delegates when they do get here find themselves relieved of about all the work and thought, and everything is ready for them to vote on "All in favor, say aye," and the "ayes have it." This makes things easy and is one of the reasons why the office of delegate is so popular. We heard one man last evening ask, "Who is to be chairman?" So that was all settled in advance. And so on, and so forth.

There were special trains provided for this morning to bring in these much needed delegates, for what would a convention be without delegates?

R. T. McDonald and C. D. Law are the Fort Wayne men seeking to be elected delegate from this district to the national convention. Mr. McDonald could not be present as he was detained by important business matters in the east. But his friends and backers were on hand. Mr. Law and his backers were present in good shape, coming in on a special train over the G. R. & I. to LaOtto and then up the Wabash to Auburn. McDonald's special train left Fort Wayne at 9 a. m. and came direct up the Lake Shore road. Both parties are claiming a victory. There will be one more delegate to be chosen, and this is sought we believe, by Frank Roby, of Angola. There are also two alternates. All the men present agree that Leighty is to be renominated for congress.

At a little after 9 the special from Columbia city reached Auburn, and at 10:30 both the Law and the McDonald trains came in, and then the Opera House began to fill up.

The Postal Telegraph Co. had an instrument put in yesterdry and the click oft he instrument sounded out cheerfully as the operator, W. E. Buchmaster, of Kendallville struck the keys.

While waiting for the leaders to come and organize the meeting the crowd put in the time yelling for "Law" or "McDonald" or for anybody whose name would help make a noise. Then there were cat call, srooster crow cackling hens and a wild time generally. Harry Hanna was elected 24 to 16 for chairman of the Allen county delegates, before leaving the Swineford It was also learned that the delegation stood about ¾ for McDonald

At 11-40 the chairman of the district, Sol. Wood rapped to order. Made a brief speech, and hoped to see a general republican success, with McKinley in the White House, cheers Frank B. Merritt and J. E. McClaskey, both of Lagrange, were put in nomination for permanent chairman, McClaskey withdrew and L. W. Welker of Noble was named in his place. J. Q. Rose was told to act as secretary. Chairman of each delegation is to collect vote and announce.

RESULT.

Allen, 26 for Merritt and and 13 for Welker; DeKalb, 6½ for Merritt and 6½ for Welker; Lagrange, 11 for Merritt; Noble, 15 for Welker; Steuben, 12 for Merritt; Whitley, 11 for Welker. Total, Merritt, 55½; Welker, 45½, and Welker asked to have it unanimous.

F. B. Merritt was then called and spoke and hoped that when this convention adjourns it will leave all strife in this hall and work for success.

Motion that J. S. Conlogue, together with other republican editors be secretaries. Woodhull offered a resolution indorsing McKinley, of Ohio (loud cheers). Adopted by a rising vote.

Secretary was now asked to read the call, which was done.

W. Bunyan, of Noble, moved we proceed to nominate a candidate for congress. Harry Hanna moved the renomination of Hon. J. D. Leighty, and made a speech guaranteeing as good a vote as in 1894.

Capt. E. D. Hartman seconded the nomination in an eloquent speech, eulogized the present member and on behalf of the people of this, Mr. Leighty's county, gave a brief account of Mr. Leighty's career in the House, and closed by saying Mr. Leighty would be elected. After several speeches Leighty was nominated by acclamation.

Peterson, moved that we proceed to the nomination of an elector for this district.

Judge Penfield asked privilege to name Hon. C. W. Tuttle, of Whitley. This was done by acclamation. Tuttle called and said he was thankful and hoped to carry Whitley. Adjourned to meet a 1 o'clock.

AFTERNOON.

Meeting called to order on time and the noise stopped. J. O. Rose took the place of Conlogue as secretary. Kimball moves we now proceed to nominate delegates to St. Louis. Frank S. Roby was elected unanimously. Roby called, took stage and spoke his thanks, and promised to do his duty. Must have a president who believes in proection for protection's sake—McKinley.

A motion was made now to call the counties for candidates for the other delegate, Allen, DeKalb, Lagrange, Noble, Steuben, and Whitley, all made no response. Melendy of Steuben, asked that Frank Roby be instructed to cast the full vote of the district; chair held the motion not in order. (Judge Taylor was absent, and he was to announce McDonald) Kimball moved that Fatty Sullivan be the alternate with Roby. Sullivan stood up, and as soon as seen was elected.

Counties called, Judge Taylor responded by speaking for R. T. McDonald. He had taught McDonald the multiplication table when he was my pupil, and he has used it to some extent. Spoke of Mac's opposition to Harrison, and the name was cheered. Speaker hoped, now that McDonald be selected for this place, though he opposed McDonald four years ago. Said Allen has only two candidates now, McDonald and Law, both good men. No one should say hard against either. Allen county is solid for McKinley, as both would vote for him at St. Louis.

The counties should take the man from Allen county, that a majority of Allen county wants.

J. B. Harper spoke for Law, and said Allen county was entitled to this place, but they would be unwise to quarrel over the matter. He said Law is backed by the great majority in Allen county (wild cheers,) The people stand for the nomination of Law (more cheers). He is superintendent of the Pittsburg road, 3,000 railroad employes in Allen ask for C. D. Law, and they will help to wipe out the democratic majority in Allen. He is a personal friend of McKinley. Wild cheers followed this speech. Harry Hanna spoke next, and poured oil on the troubled waters, as others had tried to do. He feels kindly towards Law, but spoke for McDonald, McDonald had carried 7 wards and Law 2, Skelton 1, and thinks this majority should have its way. Read a telegram from McDonald which says he is for McKinley. McDonald's purse had always been open to the old soldiers and to the republican party. Peterson said 95 per cent in Noble favored.

The vote resulted, McDonald, 36; Law, 59. And Law was declared elected.

Law was called and spoke, thanking them. Had wanted to go to St. Louis, so as to vote twice for McKinley, once at St. Louis and once at the polls. Thanked McDonald's friends, for courtesy. He believes democrats are going to be all republicans.

J. D. Ferrall, of Lagrange, was made alternate, and Wm. Bunyan, of Noble, alternate elector. Band played and convention adjourned.

NOTES.

It was a wild crowd that filled the town and convention hall yesterday but they were good natured and "hollered" as much for fun as for McKinley, McDonald or Law. And there were evidences besides the reading of the formal call, that it was not a prohibition convention. It is a matter of regret, as soon as the democrat squit drinking the republicans begin.

One hilarious fellow at the convention yesterday was interviewed by Marshal West, and passed the night in the cooler. Another drunken man made an indecent exposure of his person in front of a west Seventh street residence, and would also have been run in had he not mustered up strength enough to escape.

Several prominent republicans made the remark that the two parties, democrats and republicans were evidently drinking the same platform. It was the greatest day the saloons have had for years. Surely, no other convention ever held in Auburn yielded so large a per cent of plain drunks. Eight were noted in one group at the Wabash depot at the time of going home.

The speeches by Judge Taylor, Harry Hanna, J. B. Harper and others, were excellent, and at times eloquent. If their favorites did not get there, it was no fault of the speakers.

For a man who has held a $5,000 position under Uncle Sam, for twenty years. Judge Taylor is not a very skillful politician.

Mr. Merritt is an excellent presiding officer, but when he tried to make the delegates believe that the yelling in the gallery was done by democrats, he "fell down."

No opposition was offered to the renomination of Mr. Leighty and he is safe on the track for another race.

R. T. McDonald now probably wishes he had not fought Harrison four years ago. Whatever republicans may think of Harrison, they respect him and do not propose to see him abused. It was no doubt this feeling that made the country districts vote against McDonald.

The only hard fight was between the McDonald and the Law factions from Ft. Wayne. The vote by counties stood:

THE VOTE.

	McDonald.	Law.
Allen,	18 26-42	15 16-42
DeKalb,	5½	7½
Lagrange,	5½	5½
Noble,	3	12
Steuben,	3	3
Whitley,	11-23	10 12-23
Total,	36	59

The result was not exactly 36 and 59, for the secretaries not being very "good at figgers," failed to find the common denominator, which is 1,932, of which McDonald had 3,569, or 1 and 1,637 over: Law had 4,159 of this fraction, or 2 and 295 over. This would give McDonald 36 and over, and Law 60 and over. The matter was not of sufficient importance for such a struggle.

American Ships.

Americans cannot buy ships where they can get them cheapest. So they do not buy them at all, and no one even in this country gets the work to do. Tens of thousands of American seamen could get employment if we had merchant ships. The law should be so changed as to permit our capitalists to buy where they could get the cheapest, and so own their own vessels and employ our own people. This would stimulate our own ship builders, so that we could soon make vessels as cheaply as they could be made abroad, This sort of protection has ruined our merchant marine and instead of protecting the laborer, has prevented the building of ships entirely, and so kept that class of laborers out of a job.

Your Boy Wont Live a Month

So Mr Gilman Brown, of 34 Mill St. South Gardner, Mass.; was told by the doctors His son had lung trouble, following Typhoid Malaria, and he spent three hundred and seventy five dollars with doctor, who finally gave him up, saying: "Your boy wont live a month." He tried Dr King's New Discovery and a few bottles restored him to health and enabled him to go to work a perfectly well man. He says he owes his present good health to use of Dr King's New Discovery, and knows it to be the best in the world for Lung trouble. Trial Bottles Free at Robbins & McCord's Drug Store. 4

Not to be Trifled With.

(From Cincinnati Gazette.)

Will people never learn that a "cold" is an accident to be dreaded, and that when it occurs treatment should be promptly applied? There is no knowing where the trouble will end; and while complete recovery is the rule, the exceptions are terribly frequent, and thousands upon thousands of fatal illness occur every year ushered in by a little injudicious exposure and seemingly trifling symptoms. Beyond this, there are to-day countless invalids who can trace their complaints to "colds," which at the time of occurrence gave no concern, and were therefore neglected.—When troubled with a cold use Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It is prompt and effectual. 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by F. E. Davenport.

RIOT AT INDIANAPOLIS.

Trouble Results from the Old Foundry Strike.

A serious labor riot which resulted fatally to one man and the injury of several others, occured recently, on West Washington street, Indianapolis, the rioters keeping up a running fight for more than a square and creating intense excitement on the crowded thoroughfares.

Nearly a year ago the employes of Tayloy & Chandler's foundry went out on a strike on account of a difference regarding wages, and since that time there has been periodical trouble, the strikers being determined that non-union men should not work and the management being equally determined to employ no other labor.

Saturday evening when the men left the shop for the day a crowd of union men advanced upon them from the west, and at the same moment another crowd appeared on the east, thus having them between two sections of their enemies. With a shout the strikers attacked the non-union men with clubs, stones, and brickbats. A general fight ensued. While the men were thus struggling with each other, several pistol shots were fired, and William Watson, Walker Davis, and Hooker Lee, a bystander, were shot.

A number of the strikers were beaten with stones and clubs, and some were badly battered by the tin dinner buckets in the hands of the employes. Several of the employes were also beaten with stones and clubs, but they scattered and ran when the pistol shots were fired and the full list of the injured could not be secured. The police finally quelled the riot.

A $1,000,000 FIRE.

The Pennsylvania Salt Manufactory Ablaze.

A destructive fire broke out in the works of the Pennsylvania Salt Manufacturing Company at Natrono, Pa., and for a time threatened the destruction of the entire plant. A rough estimate places the loss at $1,000,000, probably covered by insurance.

The greatest loss is sustained through the melting of the tanks in which the gold and silver solutions were stored, and their escaping into the river. Some idea of this may be gained when it is said that 100,000 ounces of silver and 3,000,000 pounds of copper were produced monthly. This department consists of a large number of of frame buildings, covering an area of three acres, and which contained blast furnaces, smelting furnaces and lead lined tanks for storing the gold and silver solutions.

The flames spread with such rapidity that it was with difficulty that the men escaped, although only two were slightly injured. The officials are reticent as to the origin of the fire, but it was learned from good authority that a quantity of water was allowed to escape into a furnace which caused the explosion.

Killed by Brigands.

Oaxaca (Mex.) special: Advices have been received here of the killing of Henry L. Mareux, an American railroad contractor, who was on his way overland to Guatemala to take a position in railroad constructing. Mareux was traveling with two Mexicans, and the party were attacked by brigands southwest of here. Mareux refused to give up his money without a fight and was killed. His companions escaped death, but were held captive in the mountains for several days.

Killed by Whitecaps.

J. G. Field, aged 68, died in the City Hospital at London, Ont. He had both feet frozen, and was suffering from injuries inflicted on the night of March 10, when he was taken from his home in Wingham by a party of whitecaps with nothing on but his night shirt, tied to a tree, and terribly beaten. He was said to have lived in immoral converse with his daughter.

Terrific Explosion.

A terrific dynamite explosion occurred at Ellicott City, Md., resulting in the mangling and killing of ex-Tax Collector John Clagett of Howard County, and Lee Williams, colored, employed on the grading work of the Edmondson Avenue, Catonsville and Ellicott City Electric Railroad.

Fine Horseflesh Lost.

Aiken (S. C.) special: The Highland Park Hotel stables, owned by Bradwell & Lamar, were destroyed by an incendiary fire. A number of horses perished in the flames and many vehicles were destroyed. T. W. Fox of Philadelphia, lost his fine horses in the fire. The loss is heavy.

Shot His Wife and Himself.

Augustus Elz, a well-known resident of Peoria, Ill., shot and mortally wounded his wife, Mamie Elz. He afterwards went to his mother's home and shot himself through the heart, dying instantly. Elz was jealous of his wife, who, he claimed, was receiving attention from another man.

Virginia Hurricane.

A hurricane passed over Hart's Creek valley, fifty miles south of Huntington, W. Va. Buildings were blown down and immense damage was reported.

Unsuccessful Attempt to Hold Up a Train.

A special from Tulare, California, says: An attempt was made to hold up the Southern Pacific Railway's south-bound passenger train No. 19 between Tulare and Goschen stations. In a duel with one of the robbers, Under Sheriff Earl Daggett was dangerously if not fatally wounded, and Deputy Victor Reed received a bullet in the shoulder which may prove fatal. One of the robbers, who is reported to be a member of the noted Dalton gang, named McComb, was riddled with bullets and dropped from the tender of the engine, rolling down the side of the dump, where he was found a few hours later stone dead.

LIVES ARE SACRIFICED.

The Pennsylvania Fast Line Express Wrecked.

A special from Harrisburg, Pa., says: The fast line express, east bound, on the Pennsylvania railroad, ran into a live stock train near Steelton, a few miles east of here and caused a serious wreck. Two men were killed and a dozen were injured.

The dead are: Samuel Welch, engineer; Lee Strouse, fireman; both of Philadelphia. They were in charge of the locomotive of the passenger train. The engineer was terribly scalded about the head, face, and body, and died at the City Hospital. The fireman was crushed to death under the engine. Several of the passengers were slightly injured, but proceeded on their way after having their wounds dressed.

A hundred sheep were killed. The cars caught fire and the uninjured passengers went to work with snow and prevented its spreading. The cars were broken to splinters and the track was blocked for a short time.

The wreck was caused by a misplaced switch, the stock train pulling out on the passenger track and being struck sidewise by the fast line.

Business of the Country.

R. G. Dun & Co.'s Weekly Review of Trade says: A movement toward better things is still the exception. There is better business in shoes and small industries and there has been squeezing in short sellers in cotton, but the general tendency of industries and prices is not encouraging. Bad weather has cut off much business, especially in the country districts. Some failures as a consequence caused especial caution. The root of business is that in many departments men bought more and produced more, when prices were mounting and everybody was rushing to buy, last year, than they have yet been able to sell.

Shot While Stealing Coal.

James Winn, living in the eastern part of Xenia, Ohio, went to his window at 3 o'clock the other morning, and seeing a man at his coal bin shoveling up a basket of coal, fired at him with a revolver. The bullet took effect just below the thiefs shoulder, though Mr. Winn did not know it at the time, and he is now in a critical condition with the chances of his living small. The man who was shot proved to be Edward Combs, a near neighbor. Both the parties are colored. No arrest as yet.

Terrible Explosion.

Winnipeg (Man.) special: Word has just been received of a terrible explosion at the gold mines of Rossland, in the remote northwest country. As a result four men are dead and two more are seriously hurt and will probably die. Two boxes of gunpowder ignited while they were being thawed out in a tunnel. The dead are: Thomas Gibbons, Mike Ravigan, Joseph Dolan, Daniel Lynch. The injured: Ed Shanahan, single, not expected to live; Mike Brookes.

Mr. Bayard Censured.

The battle on Ambassador Bayard's Boston and Edinburgh speeches in the National House of Representatives ended Friday, when, by a vote of 180 to 71, the resolution reported by the committee on foreign affairs censuring him for the use of certain expressions contained therein, was passed.

Wrecked by Natural Gas.

A special from Dowling, an oil town in Wood County, Ohio, says: The residence of Kirk Shelley, here, was wrecked by an explosion of natural gas. His daughter, aged 16, sustained injuries from which she died in an hour. Shelley's son, aged 19, was fatally burned, and the mother seriously injured.

Explosion in a Mine.

The immense air compressors of the Norman & Tiger mines at Burke, Idaho, were totally destroyed by fire. Loss $200,000, fully covered by insurance. The mines will be shut down for six months until repairs are effected.

No Election of Senator.

The Kentucky Legislature has adjourned without electing a United States Senator to succeed Senator Blackburn or passing any of the appropriation bills. This leaves the State in a serious financial predicament.

Lost His Eyes.

At Rushville, Ind., Buford Marvin, an orphan boy of 14, was playing with some gunpowder, which unexpectedly ignited and exploded. His face was burned and the sight of both eyes forever ruined.

CARLISLE IS TO RUN.

TO BE A DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE FOR PRESIDENT.

Formal Announcement Will Be Preceded by Mr. Cleveland's Declination of a Third Term—Administration Support to Be Given Carlisle.

Cleveland to Decline.

According to a Washington correspondent, John G. Carlisle, Secretary of the Treasury, will be an aggressive candidate for the Presidency before the Democratic national convention next July in Chicago. He will stand on an uncompromising sound money platform, and it is understood that he will have the unqualified support of the present national administration. A public announcement of his candidacy will soon be made by one of the Secretary's close friends in the Senate. This announcement, however, will not be made until President Cleveland has formally stated his purpose not to permit his name to be used in the convention in connection with a third term. It is learned on excellent authority that the President has fully decided upon his course, and it is expected that he will make known his determination within a short time. Although Secretary Olney's name has been considered with favor by Democratic leaders it is known that he does not desire the nomination. It is undoubtedly true that Mr. Carlisle's candidacy will have the support of Mr. Cleveland and the members of the cabinet. His friends in conducting the canvass for his nomination will urge that it be made upon a currency platform as stated above, and, if he be successful at Chicago, will then make this issue prominent in the campaign leading up to the November elections.

GROVER'S NEW SUIT.

It Is Made of Leather and Is to Be Used on Hunting Expeditions.

On the 18th day of March, says the New York World, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, wore a new suit. It is not, however, a frivolous thing for personal adornment. It is designed for the serious, hard work attendant upon duck shooting. Just before dawn on the day on which the President entered upon his sixtieth year Mr. Cleveland, attended by Dr. O'Reilly, of Washington, and equipped with a hammerless gun and a patent rubber decoy duck, brand new, donned his spick-and-span garments, entered a flat-bottomed skiff, and devoted his energies to bagging his favorite game.

The birthday suit is made of leather and consists of trousers, waistcoat and coat, the last-named garment measuring six feet in girth. The President's gun, which he has owned for two years, is hammerless. It is a double-barreled 10-gauge affair, and cost the moderate price of $85. Mr. Cleveland does not use smokeless powder and he never shoots "on the flight" on land. The rubber decoy duck is a birthday gift. It is pneumatic, and can be sent up into the air and allowed to come down and rest upon the water, and Mr. Cleveland has spent no little time and derived no small amount of pleasure in experimenting with it.

The disadvantage of the pneumatic rubber duck is that it can be punctured, in which case it is ruined. This duck in use is as natural as life. But when it lies upon the water, with other ducks around it, you must make a sound to set the ducks rising from the water before you can fire. If you snap your gun at them as they float you will puncture your own pneumatic duck and it will collapse. A good day's sport is from ten to twenty ducks; thirty-five is very fine. The President's record shows an average of three.

IN THE CASE OF WAR.

TROOPS AVAILABLE IN THE VARIOUS STATES.

Investigation of the Organized Militia of the United States Shows There Are 9,467,604 Soldiers Available When Needed.

Uncle Sam Counts Warriors.

According to a report on the organized militia of the United States, which has just been prepared by the War Department, the United States, in case of need, can put 9,467,604 men in the field. Copies of the publication are as scarce as the proverbial hen's teeth. The public printer has furnished the War Department with only half a dozen copies, and these have been given to the President, the Secretary of War, the Assistant Secretary of War and the general commanding the army.

At the close of the year 1895 every State and territory, with the exception of Indian territory and Alaska, had an organized national guard. The total force of the militia number 115,669, of which 102,604 composed the infantry arm, 5,215 the cavalry, 5,267 the artillery, 649 special corps and 1,443 generals and staff officers. In many of the States last year camps were held, and the attendance upon these occasions ranged from 55 per cent in Mississippi to 95 per cent in Vermont. The total appropriation allowed the militia by the Government amounted to $400,000, while the States during the same period spent $2,834,974 on these organizations. It is estimated that mobilization of the militia could be effected in the different States and territories in from three hours in the District of Columbia to seventy-two hours in Oregon, other State organizations assembling between these two periods.

New York is far in the lead in the number of men enlisted in the national guard, its strength amounting to 12,901 officers and enlisted men. Pennsylvania is second, with 8,482; Ohio third, with 6,493; Illinois, 6,226; South Carolina, 5,711; Massachusetts, 5,344; California, 4,364; Georgia, 4,355; New Jersey, 3,938; Alabama, 3,120; Indiana, 3,026; Virginia, 3,006; Texas, 2,900; Michigan, 2,875; Connecticut, 2,740; Wisconsin, 2,640; Iowa, 2,398; Missouri, 2,107; Minnesota, 2,027; Maryland, 1,885; Louisiana, 1,883; Kansas, 1,815; Mississippi, 1,695; Oregon, 1,530; District of Columbia, 1,471; Kentucky, 1,469; North Carolina, 1,403; Tennessee, 1,389; New Hampshire, 1,380; Maine, 1,337; Washington, 1,184; Nebraska, 1,137; Florida, 1,088; Utah, 1,003; Rhode Island, 979; Arkansas, 974; West Virginia, 845; Colorado, 833; Vermont, 800; South Dakota, 798; Idaho, 535; North Dakota, 525; Montana, 510; Arizona, 500; New Mexico, 470; Wyoming, 450; Nevada, 439; Delaware, 427, and Oklahoma, 153.

It is estimated in this publication that in case of necessity, Illinois could place 852,625 in the field; Pennsylvania comes next with 771,874, and Ohio third with 650,000; New York, 560,000; Indiana, 481,192; Kentucky, 361,137; Missouri, 350,000; Massachusetts, 339,391; Wisconsin, 306,343; Texas, 300,000; Virginia, 295,440; New Jersey, 284,887; Georgia, 264,071; Michigan, 260,000; Iowa, 245,899; North Carolina, 240,000; Mississippi, 228,700; Maryland, 205,816; Arkansas, 205,000, and the remainder of the States below 200,000 each.

In about two-thirds of the States, the publication says, the militia is armed with the Springfield rifle and carbine of various patterns. A number of the artillery militia regiments are provided with Gatling guns and 3.2-inch breech-loading rifles, but a large proportion of the artillery armament consists of 12-pounder Napoleons, 3-inch muzzle-loading rifles, Parrot rifles and other obsolete ordnance.

The aggregate of small arms ammunition held in reserve in addition to that in the hands of the troops is not far from 3,000,000 rounds. States having Gatling gun batteries keep on hand a limited supply of ammunition for these guns. The supply for field guns is very limited, and the quality by no means the best.

Within a week or two work will be begun upon the monument which is to mark the birthplace of George Washington at Wakefield, Westmoreland County, Va.

Mrs. Abigail Knapp Holman, the wife of ex-Representative William S. Holman, of Indiana, died suddenly. Mr. Holman was with her at the time. The remains were taken to Aurora, Ind., for interment.

The bill introduced by Mr. Brossius, of Pennsylvania, to authorize the establishment of national banks in small cities was ordered to be favorably reported by the House Committee on Banking and Currency.

The Secretary of the Interior Wednesday made a requisition on the treasury for $10,190,000 for pension payments, as follows: Buffalo, $1,665,000; Chicago, $2,375,000; Concord, $700,000; Des Moines, $1,950,000; Milwaukee, $1,750,000; Pittsburg, $1,550,000; Washington, $100,000; Indianapolis, $100,000.

The Nicaraguan canal bill was agreed upon by the sub-committee which has been at work on it for several weeks. The bill provides for the reorganization of the Maritime Canal Company, the payment of all its debts, the selection of a board of fifteen directors, ten of them named by the United States, three by the canal company and one each by Nicaragua and Costa Rica.

BALLINGTON NAMES HIS ARMY.

Salvation Occasionists to Be Known as "God's American Volunteers."

"God's American Volunteers" is the title by which Ballington Booth's new Salvation army will be known. Commander Ballington Booth says that all official negotiations between Gen. Booth and himself are now closed. Ballington Booth said that the standard of the new army would be distinctly American. It will consist of a white flag, emblematical of purity. In the center will be a large blue star, typical of hope; in the middle of this star a white cross, emblematical of sacrifice for others. In the corner of the standard or flag, nearest the top of the staff, will be forty-five white stars in a field of blue, representing the States of the Union. Over the central large star will read the matto, "The Lord my manner," and underneath the words designating the number of the post to which the standard is presented. It is to be carried by a color sergeant at the head of the parade along with the national flag. Following this description the commander said: "God Almighty grant that the principles and truth represented by this standard may be preserved by the American people for all time."

The uniform to be worn by "God's American Volunteers" has been decided upon. The dresses of the women will be made of seal-brown cashmere. The skirt will be perfectly plain, of such a length that it will just clear the ground. The waist of the uniform will be a tight-fitting Norfolk jacket with three box plaits down the front and three down the back. The headgear of the women will be a poke bonnet. The men's uniforms will be almost exactly like that of the United States army.

A TWO-MILE PETITION.

The German-American Document Shipped to Albany.

A New York paper says: The petition of the German-American Citizens' Union for a liberal Sunday law was presented to the Legislature on Thursday. It is probably the most formidable document which has ever been presented to that or any other legislative body. The petition itself is brief enough, but the signatures attached to it give it its formidable character. Appended to it are about 200,000 names, and the slips pasted together make a roll of about two miles—10,500 feet—long. To put this in shape for presentation to the Legislature baffled the ingenuity of the managers of the union, and outside talent was then called in. A. B. Smith, of the Trow Directory Company, was appealed to, and he designed the reel, which is shown by the accompanying illustration. The reel is twenty-six inches in diameter, set in a tripod frame, mounted on two wheels. The reel and frame are made of black walnut, highly polished, while the wheels and trimmings are of nickel. The reel was made by a concern engaged in the manufacture of fire apparatus. The strip more than fills the reel by two inches, and encroaches to that extent upon the space between the handles.

Gov. Clarke of Arkansas has announced his withdrawal from the senatorial race.

Ten miles east of Marion, in "Nigger hollow," a westbound Big Four express met a horse and buggy comming east in the middle of the track. After the collision pieces of the buggy, two legs of a horse and a part of a pair of trousers were found. It's not yet known whether the buggy had an occupant.

Mrs. Joseph Stofer of Lafayette, went to Anderson, last week, to attend her father's funeral. As she was about to step into a cab to start to the depot, a severe pain seized her foot. It gradually permeated her whole body and she became unconscious, dying next day. Physicians were unable to do anything for her.

At Lafayette, Charles Sines died from a peculiar accident. He and Joseph Pettit were snow-balling. Sines hit Pettit with a ball of snow, and Pettit in sport threw a piece of plaster, which hit Sines above the right ear. The men were at Monon, but came to their homes in Lafayette, where Sines died soon after arriving. It was purely an accident, and Pettit was released.

The oil fever and attendant excitement resulting from a strike of oil has again taken possession of Andersonians, who are interested in Frankton. Word was received in Anderson that one of the best gas wells in the vicinity of Frankton had developed into a powerful oiler, and that fluid was flowing from the well in great quantities. A company has been formed and the well and adjacent territory will be developed.

A letter mailed at West Point, Ind., is now in the Lafayette Postoffice addressed thus: "What though the snow be high as any mountain; what though the sleet and rain in torrents pour, so much that earth would seem like one vast fountain. No matter. With this letter swiftly soar to Mr. Garibaldi D. Maginnis; whom rumor whispers dwells on Burwell place. As 'D' implies, his middle name is Dennis, this pointer use his whereabouts to trace."

One of the large continuous tanks at Ball's fruit-glass jar factory at Muncie burst, and the fifty tons of molten glass spread over the earthen floor in factory No. 1. The boiling glass would soon have fired the building, but for the organized fire department in the factory. The loss is heavy, and there is no insurance for this kind of damage. Repairs will be made and work soon resumed. The men and boys employed about the furnace escaped unhurt.

Abraham Life, who served in the Eighty-fourth Indiana until he lost his right arm in a fight on the Big Sandy, in Kentucky, is at present the subject of a peculiar affliction. Since his discharge from the army he has been farming near Farmland. A few months since his right leg began to shorten, and has decreased five inches in length within that space of time. The physicians cannot decide the cause of this peculiar contraction, although some claim that there is connection between the lost arm and his present predicament.

The Ministers' Association of New Albany, was defeated recently in its fight against the applicants for liquor licenses before the Board of County Commissioners. The ministers objected to licenses granted on the ground that the applicants did not specifically describe the rooms in which they desired to sell. Attorneys were employed by both sides. The Commissioners decided in favor of the twenty applicants, and the ministers gave notice than an appeal would be taken to the Circuit Court. A few weeks ago the ministers circulated petitions in the several wards, but failed to secure a majority of voters.

A gang of young men, strangers, are going about Shelby County selling whisky. They carry the "stuff" in buggies, afoot or on horseback, and sell to whoever wants a drink or a jug full. It is supposed they are handling the product of Brown County moonshiners.

Mrs. Solomon Reddick of Anderson, was returning in a buggy from Fisherburg when she met William Clifford, who refused to give the road for passing. Mrs. Reddick's buggy was struck, a wheel smashed and her horse ran away, upsetting the vehicle and throwing out Mrs. Reddick. She brought suit for damages, and secured a verdict for $250.

As Charles Henry was transferring his revolver from his coat to his pants pocket during prayer service at the Free Methodist Church, Fowler, the weapon was discharged, causing quite a panic. With the exception of a flesh wound received by Henry no one was hurt.

The probabilities are that the annual camp of instruction for the National Guard will be held in Indianapolis. There has been a strong sentiment that the encampment should be held there, but great difficulty has been met in making the proper arrangements. Anderson is making a strong bid for the affair and there are several other cities in the State asking for it. A liberal proposition from some city is expected within a few days.

SENATE AND HOUSE.

WORK OF OUR NATIONAL LAWMAKERS.

A Week's Proceedings in the Halls of Congress—Important Measures Discussed and Acted Upon—An Impartial Resume of the Business.

The National Solons.

The Senate had a spirited Cuban debate Monday, after the early part of the day had been given to set speeches by Mr. Lodge on immigration and Mr. Pugh on silver. The Cuban discussion was mainly important in bringing out the full reading of a statement of the Spanish side of the case by Senor Dupuy de Lome, the Spanish Minister. It claimed to detail the insurgents' methods of guerrilla warfare, the burning of cane fields, and the disorganized character of the insurgent bands. Mr. Morgan commented severely on the Minister's statements. Mr. Elkins offered a resolution directing the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report as to the status of the war in Cuba before a vote was taken in the Senate. In the House a resolution was adopted directing the Secretary of War to make a survey and estimate of the cost of a breakwater at Marquette Bay, Mich. A bill was passed authorizing the construction of a wagon and foot bridge across the Chattahoochee River at Columbia, Ala. On motion of Mr. Flynn of Oklahoma a resolution was adopted for the immediate consideration of the Oklahoma homestead bill. The bill provided that all actual and bona fide settlers on the public lands in Oklahoma should acquire patent after five years' residence upon the payment of the customary fees without the payment of the price per acre required by existing law. The Secretary of the Interior reported adversely to the bill and stated that if settlers were relieved from the payment of the purchase price (which ranged from $1.25 to $2.50 per acre) the loss to the United States would exceed $15,000,000. A bill prescribing punishment for mutilating coins and for altering or passing mutilated or lightened coins was passed.

The House devoted Tuesday to the bill to amend the administrative tariff act of 1890, and passed it without substantial amendment. The purpose of the bill is to strengthen the act of 1890, some weak spots having been developed during the six years it has been in operation. The bill was drawn after extensive hearings, and the advice and assistance of the Treasury Department, the Board of General Appraisers, importers and others with practical experience on the subject. One of the most important changes makes increased duties and penalties for undervaluation commence at the point of undervaluation, and not at 10 per cent. above the undervaluation as provided by the present law. The House Committee on Immigration decided to favorably report two important restrictive measures introduced by Mr. McCall (Mass.) and Mr. W. A. Stone (Pa.) The Stone bill establishes as a requisite for admission to the United States that the immigrant shall be provided with a certificate from the United States Consul or other authorized representative of the United States at the place nearest his last residence that he is eligible to admission to the United States under the existing laws. The McCall bill, as amended by the committee, excludes all males between the ages of 16 and 60 who are not able to read and write English or some other language. The Cuban debate was continued in the Senate.

The House Wednesday began consideration of the resolution of censure of Ambassador Bayard for his Edinburgh speech. The remarks of Mr. Cousins, of Iowa, in support of the resolution were the feature of the proceedings. The Senate had in hand the public opening of the Uncompahgre Indian reservation, but nothing of importance was done.

Cuba had the entire attention of the Senate Thursday, speeches being made by Senators Gray, Chilton and Cafferty, the debate being enlivened by many spirited incidents. Mr. Gray's plea for Cuba brought on a running cross-fire of comment and inquiry from Mr. Hale. The Delaware Senator caused much amusement by referring to Mr. Hale as "the Senator from Spain." Mr. Davis (Rep.), of Minneapolis, chairman of the Committee on Territories, reported favorably the bill to admit New Mexico to Statehood. In the House Mr. Grosvenor (Rep.), of Ohio, in reply to the remarks made by Mr. McCreary about Gen. Schenck, while minister to Great Britain, in connection with the Emma mines, and his authorship of a volume entitled "Rules of Draw Poker," referred to Gen. Schenck's distinguished services in times of war and peace. He could not understand the purpose of the attack. Mr. McCreary said that he had made no attack on Gen. Schenck. Mr. Grosvenor wanted to know then what the purpose was. If it was not intended to assail the memory of a dead man like a ghoul then the utterances of Mr. McCreary were idle words. In regard to the Emma mines the best proof of Gen. Schenck's good intentions was that he himself invested large sums of money in those stocks and continued to pay the assessments to the day of his death. As to the book on draw poker he had written out a few rules of the great American game by request of a friend and had been, of course, very much chagrined when public reference to it had been made. He abused no confidence when he said that Gen. Schenck told a friend he knew just enough about poker to always lose his money. As a poker player, however, he desired to say that he died without leaving an unpaid poker debt. In conclusion, Mr. Grosvenor rehearsed Gen. Schenck's career and paid a glowing tribute to his services in the army, in Congress and in the diplomatic service.

Famous Old Ship.

One of the most famous of the old-time packet lines of ships is at present represented by a single ship, the Great Admiral, which, under command of Captain Rowell, recently arrived at Boston in 182 days from Manila with a big cargo of hemp. She is the last of the old "Black Horse" line, which, when the firm of Baker, Weld & Co. was in its prime, consisted of twenty-eight vessels, and went a long way toward laying the foundations of some of Boston's fortunes of the present time.

Brooklyn Behind the Times.

Brooklyn is becoming very much mortified because he has no free public library, and a lively movement is on foot to secure one. A member of the New York Library Association added to the mortification of the Brooklyn people by reminding the board at a recent meeting that out of 382 towns in Massachusetts there are only twenty-four which have no public libraries, and only eight, from their geographical position, which are without facilities for reaching these institutions in some place near.

Cutting His Own Firewood.

James Gould, of Barnet, Vt., who is 94 years old, has been very busy for a week past in the woods near his home cutting wood for his year's supply of fuel. He is working alone, and says he doesn't need any assistance.

CHAPTER XLIV.

When he entered the anteroom he gave a searching look round, and, apparently not seeing the person he wanted, sat down and took up a paper to wait his arrival. It was some twenty minutes later that Barry Larron came in and took up his position by the fire.

"Christmas weather with a vengeance," he grumbled, as he rubbed his hands. "If this goes on for another week we shall be able to eat our plum-puddings and mince-pies without feeling the incongruity of the fare."

"The ground was quite white with frost this morning," said Valentine Graeme.

A young subaltern looked up eagerly. He was just out from England, and having found so much unlike what he had been led to expect, began to wonder whether he had also been advised wrongly to leave his skates at home.

Valentine, reading his unspoken thoughts, laughed aloud.

"No, no, De Vere. Put that out of your head at once. The ice is not likely to bear; though, by Jove, it helps us to bear the hot weather."

"If it helped us to bear your bad jokes with equanimity, it might be of even more service," said Larron, grimly.

"It should help you to take even them coolly," was the quick retort. Colonel Prinsep broke into the idle chat.

"Will it be taxing your memory too severely, Larron," he said, putting down his paper, "if I ask you to let me know any recollections you may have of the seventh of November?"

"The seventh of November!" cried irrepressible Val. "Why, that was the day poor Lynn was murdered."

"Ah, yes, to be sure! Thank you for reminding me, Graeme. It was the day of poor Lynn's murder, Colonel."

Major Larron spoke carelessly enough, and stroked his dark mustache with a swagger that seemed like consummate ease to the admiring subalterns, but not to his interlocutor.

"It was a more personal remembrance that I wished for," the Colonel went on. "Do you happen to remember that you and I were on the rifle range that day from one o'clock till after four?"

"I have the worst memory in the world," was the shy reply; looking, however, studiously in the opposite direction.

"I am afraid I must ask you to exert it in this case," said the Colonel, firmly. "Though the matter in itself is trivial, to me it is of importance; and I think"—with emphasis—"you can scarcely fail to remember that you were with me, that day, acting as umpire in a match with the Bengal Cavalry."

"I may have been."

"You were," emphatically declared Valentine. "It was I who met you both with the news about Lynn."

Hitherto this fact had escaped the memory of all three. Now it recurred to them.

"Oh, yes, of course! Now I recollect the circumstance perfectly," said Larron, quickly.

"Then I am sure you will not object to put it down in black and white lest you should forget again. It is to settle some doubt that ought never to have arisen. Ah, thank you, Valentine," as the Adjutant handed him a paper on which, unasked, he had jotted down some memoranda. Then he handed it to Major Larron, who hastily scrawled his name in attestation.

"Is that all you require?" he asked, rather defiantly.

"Yes, that is all. I had no idea you had such a bad memory, Larron."

The Colonel spoke with an accent of sympathy that deceived all his hearers, except him to whom it was addressed. In his case conscious guilt caused him to instantly detect the satire. When Colonel Prinsep took up his hat, and, thrusting the paper into an inner pocket, went out, he followed him into the veranda.

"You don't think, Colonel, that I intentionally suppressed any knowledge I possessed?" he asked, doggedly.

"Qui s'excuse s'accuse. When I tax you with having behaved dishonorably toward me, it will be time enough to defend yourself."

Colonel Prinsep left and walked on quickly in the direction of the Cutchery. At any other time he would have felt unmitigated disgust at Major Larron's perfidy; but now his mind was so engrossed with other more important matters that he could even smile at the discomfiture which his evident knowledge of the truth had caused.

When he reached the Cutchery, he was told that the "bufra sahib" was engaged, but would be at leisure presently. Then almost immediately a second messenger came to admit him to the Commissioner's presence.

When he entered he saw at once that his advent was embarrassing as well as unwelcome. Mr. Knollys looked flurried and hot, beyond the heat for which the huge fire that was burning beside him could account.

"I have come," said the Colonel, after a cold bow had been accorded to him and returned with politeness, "to discuss with you some private information I have received from Calcutta. It appears that, in consequence of an inquiry that is to be made again as to Trooper Lynn's death, all leave in the regiment is stopped. Now this is so grave an aspersion upon myself and brother officers that you will understand that I came to you at once to put the matter on a proper footing."

"Excuse me, sir," broke in the Deputy Commissioner, angrily, "if I decline to receive any communication from you, save in an official form."

"That you have the power to do so I freely admit, but surely in this case, considering the friendship that has always existed between yourself and us——"

"Pardon me again, returned Mr. Knollys, with a pompous air of regret, not far removed from real dignity, "if, since certain facts have come to my knowledge, I disassociate you in my mind entirely from a regiment that in every other case I have had reason to respect as well as like."

"What those facts are I have learned from Miss Knox," was the quiet reply.

The Deputy Commissioner looked as startled as he felt. A tete-a-tete with a murderer in any case was unpleasant, but when, to add to this, the murderer was aware of his companion's suspicions—perhaps, too, that he was the only person that held them—the position grew positively dangerous.

"It is to question you as to those facts I am here," continued the Colonel.

"It is quite illegal—against all etiquette," stammered the Commissioner, in return.

"Granted. Still I don't think you will refuse to let me know what case you have against me, and allow me to prove myself innocent if I can"—with a half smile.

"But you cannot!" was the violent retort, the speaker losing his magisterial demeanor in the exasperation he felt at the audacious composure of the other. "Who else had any motive for committing such a crime? You were in love with Miss Knox; she was first engaged to the deceased, and afterward, when that engagement was broken, she refused to marry you while he lived. She complained to you of the persecution to which she was subjected by him, and almost immediately the persecution ceased; though not—heaven forbid!—as she intended. All this I have directly, or indirectly, learned, and more still remains to be proved."

"The merest circumstantial evidence," remarked the Colonel, gently impatient. "Not a case to bring into court, certainly; and it falls to pieces at once before the defense that I have brought. Will you oblige me, Mr. Knollys, by reading this?"

He handed over the paper containing the statement that Valentine had drawn out and Major Larron subsequently signed.

A little nervously the Deputy Commissioner fixed his glasses to peruse it. An uneasy doubt crept into his mind whether he had not been premature in his conclusions, or at least expressed them too frankly. Then, when he had read it through, his glasses fell, and he stared in speechless, open-mouthed dismay before him.

"I can hardly credit that you ever really believed me capable of such an act."

The Deputy Commissioner looked the picture of contrition and confusion.

"Forgive me, Colonel Prinsep. I cannot express my regret," he faltered out.

"Do not attempt it, please. Let it be forgotten. I shall never revive the matter, and you can atone for your mistake by maintaining a similar silence."

Then Colonel Prinsep repaired to the Quartermaster's bungalow. He asked to see Mr. Knox himself, and was closeted with him for more than an hour. When he came out, Jane was waiting in the veranda.

"It is all right. I can see it in your eyes!" she cried, coming eagerly toward him.

"What a wise little girl it is! Yes, I think the danger is over now. But there is one thing you may not like. Your father is sending in his papers, and will go home at once. It was impossible that he could remain in the regiment. You see that, don't you?"

Jane nodded comprehensively, but her countenance fell. Even when they had been going for a year she felt a dread foreboding that they might never meet again; but now that this eternal separation was certain—did he feel not a tinge of regret?

She stole a hurried upward glance. He was looking grave, yet not absolutely sad; as their eyes met he even gave a slow smile. If he felt no sorrow in saying farewell, she must not betray her own.

"It is best so, I suppose," she observed.

"It was the only thing that could be done," he insisted, gently. Then, after a slight pause, he added: "I am spending Christmas at the Molnets' with Mrs. Dene. Have you any message I can take?"

"None, I thank you."

The Colonel was looking down at her steadily; and as he gazed, an expression of restrained yearning came into his eyes. Yet he made no sign. Sweet as it would have been to whisper words in her ear that would have cleared away the sadness from the pretty, pathetic face, he dared not risk anything by a premature eclaircissement. Better far that she should suffer something now for awhile than condemn them both to life-long misery.

"Good-by, Jenny," he said, gently.

A bright flush suffused her face. She raised her eyes shyly, and half laughed, more in tenderness than mirth.

What a frail barrier it was between them, after all.

CHAPTER XLV.

Christmas came and went. To Jane the festivities seemed the dreariest that had ever been. They had several invitations—for, whatever people might say or think, they could not be less than civil to them, seeing that both Mrs. Dene and Miss Knollys retained their friendship—but these had been declined on the plea of Mr. Knox's illness. But the Quartermaster was more like himself since he had spoken with the Colonel.

And, during these dismal days at Christmas, Jane had fulfilled her promise. She asked her mother to tell the whole story of the intercepted letters, or rather, all of it that was connected with Stephen Prinsep.

"He was not to blame at all!" declared Mrs. Knox, stoutly.

"Yet he knew that Jacob Lynn had not really given me up."

"Not until about two days before that fixed for your wedding. I had heard the detachment was to march in, and, afraid that they might arrive too soon, I confessed to him what I had done!"

"And he let the deceit continue."

"That he did so was my fault. His first impulse was to go to you and tell you all; but I implored him not to betray me and spoil your happiness as well as his own. I don't think that even then he would have consented to remain silent—for he knew how obstinate you were, and that you would never listen to reason—only that you yourself came and called him. You looked so pretty and loving, Jenny, as you stood outside the window, I did not wonder he could not give you up."

Jane did not answer. She was wondering whether it was not her own obstinacy, at first, which she had hitherto dignified by the name of firmness, that had really been to blame for all that had subsequently occurred. Ah, well, if it were so, she was sufficiently punished! There would be no more efforts to try to make her change her mind. Her firmness was no longer doubted. On this she could congratulate herself; but, oh, what a barren honor it was!

So the days dragged on—those last days which are most difficult to live through, when, all arrangements having been made, and nothing left to do to occupy the hands at least, if not the mind, it only remains to wait patiently the moment of departure.

Only four days remained when Stephen Prinsep rode up to the Quartermaster's bungalow, and meeting Mrs. Knox, was allowed to go in alone to find Jane. He opened the door quietly, and stood upon the threshold. There she was, leaning against the window-frame, her face pressed against the glass, as she looked along the road. Was she looking for him? He had taken another road, so it happened that she did not see him come.

The light shining through the window showed clearly the slender outline of her drooping figure, and made her dark-blue serge assume a richer hue for the time. Her hair gleamed like gold in the strong light, but it seemed as though nothing could give brightness to the sweet, pale face, the tired eyes, so languidly upraised. Nothing? That remained to be seen.

He came forward quietly, so quietly that, still as everything was in the room, she never heard his footsteps. He had risked his all on this chance of taking her by surprise—would he fail? Hope, doubt, and despair chased each other through his brain as he stood with arms stretched forward.

"Jenny! My love!"

She turned and saw him. A quick gleam came into the hazel eyes, a warm flush made more beautiful the lovely, sorrowful face. She forgot everything save that he loved her, and was here, as with a glad low cry she threw herself weeping into his arms.

When, the first happy oblivion over, she tried to draw herself away again, she found it was too late. He held her fast.

"Do you think I shall ever let you escape me again?" he asked, with a triumphant, tender smile.

"I thought you were not even coming to say 'good-by,'" she sobbed, tearfully, as though to excuse, or at least account for her emotion.

"Nor have I. Please heaven, I shall not say 'good-by' to you again, my darling."

She shook her head, yet could not restrain a happy smile at his masterful manner.

"We start for England on Friday"—disengaging herself from his embrace.

"An unlucky day. Marry me to-morrow instead!" he suggested, audaciously.

"Have you forgotten?" she asked, reproachfully. "How could I marry you, when I should only bring disgrace?"

"And happiness complete, and pride unspeakable in the loveliest wife man ever had! Would all that count for nothing?"

The sweet flattery soothed her momentary indignation. There was no shadow on her face as she looked up to ask him shyly:

"And you have loved meall the time?"

The answer was so evidently satisfactory that his offense was condoned, and he was allowed to unfold his plans and subject them to her approval.

Jane could only smile her thanks, her feelings were too deep for words; yet the lovely humid eyes told their own tale of gratitude and love. They could never misunderstand each other again.

Presently Stephen Prinsep raised her two white hands and looked at them critically.

"You have the loveliest hands in the world, Jenny, and they certainly need no adornment; but why is it you never wear a ring? That silver one——"

"I lost the best part of that!" was the quick reply.

"I wonder if by any chance I found it?"

It was growing dark, but even through the gloom the golden hoop shone brightly as he drew it from his pocket.

She recognized it at once, and blushing beautifully, stretched out her hand to take it.

But he held it high above her head.

"Not yet, my love—not yet! It shall be yours again very soon, never fear; but not now—not to-day—to-morrow!"

(The end.)

A MOUNTAIN COURTSHIP.

Sudden and Successful Wooing Described by an Eye-Witness.

"I was in what's known as the 'flag pond' district of Unicoi County, Tennessee," said a traveling man to a Washington Star writer, "when a young man rode up in front of the cabin where I was stopping and spoke to a girl who was dipping water from a spring.

"'Howdy, Sal.'

"'Howdy, Tom.'

"'Come jump on the hoss an' go to Erwin with me.'

"'What fur?'

"'Ter git married.'

"'But yo' hain't done co'ted ma yit.'

"'I know I hain't, but I've done been too pestered with work. I allus intended ter marry yer, though.'

"'But I hain't got no clo's,' remonstrated the girl.

"'Well, we'll jess ride on yon side o' Erwin to Sister Mag's in the cove, an' I'll git yer a dress.'

"'Sho'ly, Tom?'

"'Sho'ly, Sal.'

"'What kin' of a dress?'

"'Best thar is in Lowe's sto'.'

"Not another word was said. Sal dropped the bucket and jumped on the horse, shouting to her mother:

"'Mam, me an' Tom is going ter git married at Erwin. We'll be by here in the mornin'.'

"The mother started as if to call her back, but the horse was galloping down the lane, and she went and carried in the bucket of water without comment.

Finance and Finesse.

Here is a story about a member of Parliament well known for his knowledge of his own knowledge about all questions of finance. This wise statesman was approached by a reputable-looking man, who said, with a deferential but not servile manner, "Excuse me, sir, are you not Mr. Blank?"

"I am," said the M. P., with affable dignity.

"I believe you are well informed upon all financial questions."

"My friends and the press are kind enough to say so."

"You have given much attention to the subject, I think?"

"More than to anything else."

"And no doubt you could give a satisfactory answer to almost any question I might ask?"

The member saw that he was being "interviewed" and wished to say something that would look well in print.

"Well, I have a question in finance that I should be greatly pleased if you would answer to my satisfaction."

"Very good. What is it?"

"Will you lend me a sovereign for a day or two?"

The M. P. produced the sovereign.

"By George!" he said afterward, "he could have caught me for five just as well if he had only known it!"

To Remove a Tight Ring.

To remove a tight ring from the finger, take a long thread of silk and put one end under the ring and draw it through several inches, holding it with the thumb in the palm of the hand. Then wind the long end of the silk tightly round the finger down to the nail. Take hold of the short end of the silk, and, holding it toward the finger end, unwind it, and the silk pressing against the ring will withdraw it.

Texas Cotton.

Texas' cotton crop is smaller than last year's, but the total of all agricultural products is, in value, considerably greater.

BATTLE BETWEEN SPANIARDS AND CUBANS AT CALIMETE.

The battle of Calimete was one of the hardest fought of the war. Generals Gomez and Maceo commanded the Cubans and Colonel Perada the Spaniards. The Cubans were attacked by the Spaniards in early morning and succeeded in forcing their assailants to retreat, leaving their dead and wounded. The Cubans lost 20 killed and 50 wounded, and the Spaniards 250 in all. Had the Cubans' ammunition not given out the Spanish loss would have been greater.

GEN. MILES IN DANGER

INCIDENT OF THE LAST STRUGGLE OF THE SIOUX.

A Thrilling Account of How an Impetuous Soldier Imperiled the Life of His Commander and Frustrated His Well-Laid Plans.

Lame Deer Fires at Close Range.

"The campaigns against the combined tribes composing the Sioux or Dacotah nation had been prosecuted with such vigor and success through the latter half of 1876 and the early part of 1877 that by spring, 1877, all except one band had been brought into complete and final subjection," writes General Miles in his novel. "Lame Deer's band was still on the warpath, and that doughty chief had boasted that no force strong enough to beat him in battle could overtake him or come near his camp in his own chosen fastnesses. So while proper dispositions were being made of those Indians who had surrendered, a band was being equipped to teach Lame Deer and his band that the white man could approach his villages.

After their people had surrendered and confidence had been restored, it was explained to White Bull (or The Ice), Brave Wolf, Hump, and others who acted as hostages at the cantonment now Fort Keogh, that it was very important that the only hostile camp left in the country should be brought in. They acquiesced fully, and in fact seemed much incensed because Lame Deer had staid out, knowing that his depredations would be charged to their people, who were disposed to remain at peace. When the command was ready to move, May 2, 1877, some of these men were taken along as guides, as they were well acquainted with the habits and haunts of those who were still in hostility.

"Four troops of the Second cavalry had been sent to report to me. With this command, two companies of the Fifth infantry and four of the Twenty-second infantry, I started up Tongue River, Montana, on May 5, and after a march of sixty-three miles from the Yellowstone I crossed the trail of Lame Deer's camp, where he had moved west toward the Rosebud about the middle of April. Foreseeing that some of their men would be watching our command we passed on, as if apparently not noticing the trail or seeking their camp. After a short march beyond the trail the command went into camp apparently for the night on the Tongue River then after dark leaving our wagon train with an escort of three infantry companies, we marched directly west under cover of the darkness with the balance of the command, straight across the country as it was possible to move a body of mounted troops.

Although it rained during a part of the night, we marched as rapidly as possible in a country of that broken character a distance of some thirty miles to a high divide between the Rosebud and Big Horn, a spur of the Wolf mountains. Here we concealed ourselves in a pocket of the mountains. This is a term used for describing a small park surrounded on all sides except the entrance by high bluffs or ridges. The scouts were then sent out, and, carefully reconnoitering the country, they found that the camp of Lame Deer had passed only a few days before. Both the white scouts and the Indian performed their duties thoroughly, and from the top of a high peak they discovered the Indian village some fifteen miles in the distance.

"We approached a point within eight miles of the village, where we remained until 1 o'clock the next morning. Then we started, moving slowly to the valley of the Rosebud, and then up that valley for two or three miles, and at 4 o'clock a. m. May 7 and just at the dawn of day we found ourselves in close proximity to the Indian village.

"The mounted infantry and scouts under Lieutenants Casey and Jerome were ordered to charge directly up the valley and stampede the Indian horses, while the battalion of cavalry followed at a gallop and attacked the camp. This attack was gallantly made. The command under Lieutenants Casey and Jerome stampeded the entire herd of ponies, horses and mules, some 450 in number, and drove them five miles up the valley, where they rounded them up and by a long circuit brought them around to the rear of the command which was engaging Indians.

"When attacked the Indians fled from their camp, taking only what they carried in their hands, up among the high bluffs and rugged hills in that vicinity.

"Firing was now going on all about us.

"In the surprise and excitement of the wild onset of the charge a group of stalwart warriors was forced out from the others and became separated from the rest of the tribe. Before making the attack I had ordered our Sioux and Cheyenne Indians to call out to the Lame Deer Indians that if they threw down their arms and surrendered we would spare their lives, as I was anxious to capture some of them alive and hoped thereby to secure the surrender of all the Indians in the camp. As we galloped up to this group of warriors they apparently recognized the purpose of the demand and dropped their guns upon the ground.

"In order to assure them of our good will I called out 'How-how-coin' (meaning friend), and extended my hand to the chief, Lame Deer, which he grasped, and in a few seconds more I would have secured him and the others, although he was wild and trembling with excitement. My assistant, Adjutant General George W. Baird, was doing the same thing with the head warrior, Iron Star. Unfortunately just at that time one of our white scouts rode up and joined the group of officers and soldiers with me; he had more enthusiasm than discretion, and, I presume, desiring to insure my safety, drew up his rifle and covered the Indian with it. Lame Deer saw this and evidently thought the young scout was going to shoot him. I know of no other motive for his subsequent act than the belief that he was to be killed whether he surrendered or not. As quick as thought, with one desperate, powerful effort, he wrenched his hand from mine, although I tried to hold it. He grasped his rifle from the ground, ran backward a few steps, raised his rifle to his eye and fired. Seeing his determined face, his firm set jaw, wild eye, and the open muzzle of his rifle, I realized my danger and instantly whirled my horse from him, and in this quick movement the horse slightly settled back upon his haunches; at that moment the rifle flashed within ten feet of me, the bullet whizzed past my breast, leaving me unharmed, but unfortunately killing a brave soldier near my side. Iron Star broke away from Adjutant Baird at the same time.

"This instantly ended every effort to secure their peaceful surrender and opened a hot fight that lasted but a few seconds; a dozen rifles were opened on the scattered warriors who were fighting us, and all went down quietly beneath the accurate, close and rapid fire. The whole incident was over in much less time than it takes to describe the scene."

BIG TURTLE OF THE ORIENT.

One Weighing Five Hundred Pounds Found on the Egmont Islands.

A Frenchman named Anteime, traveling in the East, heard from some natives recently that on one of the Egmont islands, a group of insignificant dots in the Indian Ocean northeast of Madagascar, there was an enormous turtle. M. Anteime, surmising from the description that the creature belonged to a species supposed to be extinct, determined to capture it if possible, and visited the islands for that purpose. He found the monster after a short search. It was captured without a fight, but great care was used to prevent it from being hurt in any way. The natives regarded it with the greatest awe and could scarcely be induced to lay hands upon it. It weighs a little over 500 pounds and its back shield measures nearly six feet across. This is the only specimen that has ever been captured alive. It will probably be sent to Paris at an early date to be added to the collection in the Jardin des Plantes.

CHARLES OF ROUMANIA.

European Monarch Who Wears a Crown Made from Cannons.

No king in Europe is a better king or a hardier or stronger one than is Charles, who is the King of Roumania. This monarch is one of the most interesting of the rulers of Europe. It is now thirty years since Charles was made prince of the country he now rules, and he was recognized by the great powers just six months after his election to the throne. But the life of a prince is not always a happy one, and Charles found out this truth early in life. But he had a strong hand and a strong mind and he emerged from his troubles in triumph. He is universally acknowledged to be a great soldier, a clever statesman and a popular sovereign. It was only a year or so ago that he reached the full measure of his hope and ambition. It was then that he successfully negotiated the marriage between his heir and the daughter of no less powers than the imperial house of Russia and Great Britain. King Charles' crown is an iron one. It was made of metal from the cannons taken from the Turks at Plevna some years before it was fashioned into the little circlet that rests on his brows whenever he cares to fit it to his head. He fought gallantly for that crown, and those who like monarchies and the things that to them belong will not grudge him his reward, such as it is. He is liked by his people, and is not averse to treating them pretty well even in times of peace.

CHARLES OF ROUMANIA.

Her Dower Too Small.

The suit of Marquis di Marescotti, of Bologna, Italy, against the Princess Anna Maria Torlonia, of Rome, which has just come to an end in the former city, has excited widespread interest. It had a curious origin. In 1821 a Torlonia was married to a Marescotti, and brought him a marriage gift considerably less than had been promised. The marquis of that time sued for the difference, and the present marquis received a verdict of 267,000 francs against the family.

EASTER HATS,

MARCH 26 AND 27.

The opening of the season find us well prepared to take care of the rush of spring business that our long experience and well selected stock is sure to bring us.

Fashion makers have provided an endless line of beautiful novelties in hats of medium sizes for spring, and with them the essential roses, violets and foliage, some of which are wonderfully natural.

Ribbons in the warp prints and ombre effects must meet with wide favor, and the hat that does not show a jeweled ornament is a rare exception.

The light spring gauzes, cheffous, crepes, etc., are a decidedly new fashion.

Remember that we take great pleasure in showing you our stock. We appreciate past patronage and shall endeavor to merit a continuance of the same.

J. WM. WAGNER,
Sec'y.

Garrett, Ind. March 9, 1896.

ROBINSON VS LEIGHTY

That is the way the congressional campaign will show up this year. Mr. Leighty, as the candidate on the republican ticket has already been nominated. Mr. Robinson, although not yet nominated, has no opposition, and without a shadow of a doubt, he will be the democratic standard bearer in the coming campaign. He will be nominated at Kendallville, April 7, with a unanimous vote, a thing that never happened in this district before for either party, except in case of a renomination. Mr. Robinson is a clean man a thoroughgoing democrat a man of the people, and what is very valuable just now, he is a successful vote getter. We have no doubt of his success at the polls. It will be a lively canvass, of course, for Mr. Leighty is also a vote getter. But he will go into this campaign handicapped by the do nothing record of this congress, of which he is a part, and for which he will have to bear, right or wrong, a share of the blame. We consider it certain that James M. Robinson will be the next member of congress from this district.

CANDIDATES.

There seems to be few candidates out for any office this year except for president and governor. And there can be but one candidates for each of these in Indiana. In our own county, things seem to be waiting for a thaw. One important matter has been almost overlooked, and that is, we are to have a new commissioner in the southwest district to take Mr. Hague's place in December 1897. People seem to have forgotten the southwest. All know that a new man must be elected in the southeast to take Mr. Henderson's place in December of this year. In that district there has been a man talked up on each side. A. D. Moore of Willmington, is for the republicans, and ex-trustee B. A. Woodcox of Concord for the democrats. Just now it looks as if these two would be the nominees for this important place. But time will tell and our people will talk the matter over and suit themselves. But how is it in the southwest?

FROM ST. JOE.

Saturday March 21st being the last day of the school for this year in the department, Miss Addie Widney teacher. Joint exercises were held by the primary and intermediate, Miss Mary Murray Teacher. Recitations dialogues and songs were the order of the day. The two departments have been practicing for several days past and judging from the manner in which the program was carried out, we should say that the drilling had been quite up to the standard. Too much cannot be said in praise of Miss Widney and Miss Murray in their faithfulness in their duties as teachers during the last term of school. That they are entitled to and have the respect and love of their pupils and good wishes of parents and neighbors was well shown by the attendance at the school room on Saturday. To finish up, Miss Widney served to all her little ones, 48 in number, a paper sack full of peanuts and candy. We could not understand why it was that she did not serve all alike, but suppose she could tell. It was unanimously agreed by the crowd that it was a grand treat and all felt that it was good to be there.

ONE WHO WAS THERE.

BUTLER.

Jerry North, a long and well known citizen of Butler, was buried last week. He was born in Ohio in 1833 and came to Indiana in 1847, settling near Butler. Was married in 1863. He leaves a wife and several grown up children.

Mother Eddy is improving, with hopes of early recovery.

A daughter of Christopher Keller is confined to her bed by illness.

Orla J. Campbell, of Chicago, is visiting his Butler friends and relatives.

A. J. Price, of Troy township, will move to Butler soon.

Some of Butler's saloonists seem to be plainly violating the Nicholson law by running billiards in the same room with their saloons. Will not some good citizens whisper this into the ears of the grand jury, or shout it at the top of their voices to courts that are in session so much of the time. It is bad enough to suffer the resultant evils of these cess pools of iniquity when conducted in strict accordance with the law, but worse when they become open violators of it.

"On to Richmond," is the cry of the M. E. ministers who meet there in annual conference this week.

The engine in the bicycle factory gave out last Saturday and the hands get a holiday.

SUMMIT.

Our town was visited by a fire last Tuesday afternoon about 4 o,clock which burned the dwelling belonging to the Widow Mottinger, of Newville, Ind. It was occupied by our agent, M. J. Foster. The neighbors saved most of the things down stairs in the front part, but nothing was saved upstairs All of Mrs Foster's clothing was burned and most everything in the kitchen. The fire originated, it is thought, in the chimney between the roof and ceiling. Mr. Foster's have the sympathy of their neighbors. They have moved in with Geo. Corbin's.

Thad Thomas and wife of Hamilton, took dinner with Mrs. T's mother, Mrs. P. H Gramling last Monday while enroute for Auburn where they were going to visit relatives for a few days.

Mr. A. A. Forney's little boy has been quite sick the past week.

CORUNNA.

Charley Wallace was in Waterloo one day last week.

The Richland township school examination took place in Corunna last Saturday.

Miss Minnie Finch returned home on Saturday from a week's visit with friends in Auburn.

The family of Martin Rice moved to Ligonier last week. Mr. Rice has been there for several months as watchman at a railroad crossing.

Ervin Wigent returned from the St. Joseph hospital on the 18th. He is still very weak, but improving.

Homer Hall is working at the Depot in David Shook's place during his absence.

Rev. Speckein is attending the M. E. Conference this week at Richmond, Ind.

A little son of Henry Beuchat is very low with lung fever.

Rev. and Mrs. J. A. Sumwalt of Orland were in Corunna last Monday afternoon and night, the guests of Mrs. Sumwalt's parents. They were on their way to Richmond to attend the M. E. Conference.

E. Hoffman and L. Monroe, with cocked revolvers, searched a quartet of tramps at the depot last Monday. Not finding what tney were looking for, they were allowed to proceed on their way, and you, gentle reader, will be safe in betting your last nickel, that they proceeded without any unnecessary delay.

William Murphy visited his sister, Mrs. Gregg, near Montpelier, Ohio, last week.

It not only is so, it must be so, One Minute Cough Cure acts quickly, and that's what makes it go. Davenport, the Druggist.

—If you are suffering fram Catarrh or any disease of the nose, throat or lungs, Dr. Nusbaum's specific treatment will cure you. W. H. Nusbaum, M. D. tf.

—Simon Rohm, who lives north of town on the Waterloo road, will sell a large amount of desirable personal property on Friday, March 27. Don't forget it.

"Give me a liver regulator and I can regulate the world," said a genius. The druggist handed him a bottle of DeWitt's Little Early Risers, the famous little pills. Davenport the Druggist.

—Two copies of Rand McNally Co's. World Atlas for sale at this office. A chance for any one who needs an up-to-date atlas, published in 1895.

A high liver with a torpid liver will not be a long liver. Correct the liver with DeWitt's Little Early Risers, little pills that cure dyspepsia and constipation. Davenport, the Druggist.

—Our old neighbor, Peter Fisher, at Waterloo, has his pension increased. We are glad to hear it, for a rebel minie bullet plowed a hole clear through him. He has earned his pension and its increase.

—Don't invite disapointment by experimenting. Depend upon One Minute Cought Cure and you have immediate relief. It cures croup. The only harmless remedy that produces immediate results. Davenport the Druggist.

Simple Lessons in Electricity for beginners are among the features of the Detroit Electricel Student, a bright, illustrated weekly paper, devoted to popular electricity. One dollar a year. Student Publishing Company, 33 Lafayette Ave. Detroit, Mich.

Our young friend, Frank Shull having settled down to married life, takes the best family paper in the county, of course. Glad to have them on our list.

—Soothing, heanlig, cleansing, DeWitt Witch Hazel Salve is the enemy to sores, wounds and piles which it never fails to cure. Stops itching and burning. Cures chapped lips and cold-sores in two or three hours. Davenport the Druggist.

—Judge McClellan has been chosen one of the judges in the oratorical contest between the students of the Chicago University and those of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor. The contest takes place in the latter city, March 27. It is gettting so they have to draw on Auburn for talent in almost every line. The judge will be able to fill the bill for them.

—J. W. Pierce, Republic, Iowa, says: "I have used One Minute Cough Cure in my family and for myself, with results so entirely satisfactory that I can hardly find words to express myself as to its merit. I will never fail to recommend it to others, on every occasion that presents itself." Davenport the Druggist.

To Consumptives.

As an honest remedy Foley's Honey and Tar does not hold out false hopes in advanced stages, but truthfully claims to give comfort and relief in the very worst cases, and in the easly stages to effect a cure. Robbins & McCord. 10-13

All last winter Mr. Geo A. Mills, of Lebanon, Conn., was badly afflicted with rheumatism, At time it was so severe that he could not stand up straight, but was drawn over on one side "I tried different remedies without receiving relief," he says, "until about six months ago I bought a bottle of Chrmberlain's Pain Balm. After using it for three days my rheumatism was gone and has not returned since For sale by F. E. Davenport. 10-13

The most Popular.

A canvass among the druggists of this place reveals the fact that Chamberlain's are the most popular proprietary medicines sold. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, especially, is regraded as in the lead of all throat trouble remedies, and as such, is freely prescribe by physicians. As a croup medicine, it is also unexcelled, and most families with young children keep a bottle always handy for instant use. The editor of the Graphic has repeatedly known Chamberlain's Cough Remedy to do the work after all other medicines had failed.—The Kimball S. D. Graphic. For sale at 25 and 50 cents per bottle by F. E. Davenport.

Friday's Daily.

Pain has no show with Dr. Miles' Pain Pills.

—Dr. Carey was up from Spencerville to-day, to see a patient he is treating here.

—Three cents a line will be charged for the publication of resolutions and 25 cents for card of thanks, hereafter.

—J. H. Kling, our young Newville township friend got even and ahead with the COURIER to-day. That suits us both.

One Minute Cough Cure touches the right spot. It also touches it at the right time if you take it when you have a cough or cold. See the point? Then don't cough.

—Mrs. Mary McManus of Lima, Ind. has been the guest of her sister, Mrs. P. D. West. She returned home this morning.

—A man named Ira Smith, living on the Allen county line not for from Spencerville, accidently shot himself in the leg Tuesday. Reported doing well.

Quick in effect, heals and leaves no scar. Burning, scaly skin eruptions quickly cured by DeWitt's Witch Hazel Salve. Applied to burns, scalds old sores, it is magical in effect. Always cures piles.

—What's the difference between cheap wall paper and wall paper cheap? Just the difference between wall paper that covers up, and wall paper that decorates. Olds Bros. have wall paper that decorates.

—The following persons have been licensed to marry: Sidney Stringham and Margaret Shull, Purdy High and Nellie Brugh, John M. Freeze and Nora Strausburg and Letitia Bowman.

Last season Ike L. Hall, druggist of West Lebanon, Indiana, sold four gross of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy and says every bottle of it gave perfect satisfaction. For sale by F. E. Davenport.

—Alfred Schoup, of Richland was here to-day. His father, Wm. Schoup and also his mother, are both, still laid up with rheumatism, as they have been for some years. We had hoped to hear of their improvement.

—Roy, the year old son of Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Dancer in Jackson township died last night, and will be buried to-morrow. The funeral will be at the Lockwood church near the home at 2 p. m. and interment in Evergreen cemetery.

—Mrs. Edward Mason took the No. 6, on the B. & O. last evening for Cincinnati, where she will visit relatives and friends a few weeks. Then she will leave for Fitzgerald Gorgia, where she will join her husband and son, who has been there for the past six weeks.

—Our young lightning slinger, Will Reincehl has a spic and span new uniform. He looks as fine as a brigadier general, and behaves a good deal better than those fellows often do. We are glad to see, also, that he is progressing well in telegraphy and bids fair to be an extra good operator.

The following is a rough estimate of the number of people who were fed at the hotels and restaurants yesterday: Swineford House, 200; Holister House, 170; Glazier House, 100; Hidy's Restaurant, at tables, 150. The various lunch rooms all were crowded and there is no way of estimating how many were fed at these places.

—J. M. Carmer, the hay buyer, has one of the finest overcoats we have seen. The cape is of wombat hide, very soft, light colored fur. This animal is the Australian oppossum. The body of the coat is made of the hide of Galloway cattle, and the hair is as long as ordinary buffalo, and much more attractive, being long, glossy and fine. It goes to show that these shaggy cattle will hereafter be raised to take the place of the lost buffalo, in making robes, etc.

—F. W. Hoffman and C. C. Chick, dentists, are here to locate in the practice of their profession. Both are fresh from graduacion and work at the Indiana College of Dentistry, now a department of the great University of Indianapolis. Mr. Chick is a new citizen in this section, but Mr. Hoffman is a former DeKalb man, his home having been till about eight years ago, at Waterloo. He has many acquaintances over the county. Both are young men and carry diplomas from one of the best dental colleges in the country. When they have fitted up their rooms they will ask a share of our people's patronage, which we have reason to believe they are worthy of.

Free Pills

A Remarkable Cure.

Mrs. H. B. Adams, 1609 Wabash ave., Chacago, says: "I had a scrofulous taint of the blood from childhood which however, remained dormant. An ulcer began on the side of the nose, having all the appearance of a most malignant cancer. The agony of mind I suffered cannot be described as I contemplated the progress of such a malignant disease. Finally I was induced to try Foley's Sarsaparilla. It appeared to neutralize the poison in the blood. The growth of the ulcer ceased. The diseased tissues in the bottom and edges of the sore seemed to loosen and the natural flesh to take its place. No part of the disease remains." Robbins & McCord. 10-13

Dr. Miles' Pain Pills are guaranteed to stop Headache in 20 minutes. "One cent a dose."

—Gov. Matthews has been quite sick and at times serious fears were felt by his friends all over the country. But it is now hoped he may pull through.

—We enjoyed a visit to-day from Ex-Commissioner Ed Kelham. He is always full of good thoughts and information.

—Mrs. Rebecca Dickinson has gone this week to remain about five weeks at the home of her son John Sibert, at Bodkins in Shelby county, O. Her sister there is in very poor health and she goes mainly to be with her for a time.

—Dr. Dills of Fort Wayne, well known to many Auburn and DeKalb county people, is lying at the point of death in California. A telegram was sent to Ft. Wayne Saturday announcing that he would live but a few days.

—The Monadock, a first-class cruiser on the the Pacific, is now finished, and has been tried at sea. She has been twenty-one years building, having been commenced in 1875. She was finished at the Mare Island navy yard, on the Pacific.

—J. W. McKay will soon move to Lima, Ohio, where George has been in business for some time. So he will have a sale of his household goods as noted elsewhere. We hate to see him move away, but hope his business will be successful.

—Do you remember the adage tha "Prevention is better than cure?" This is just the time of the year to exercise a little care to prevent sickness. Go get some Simmons Liver Regulator liquid or powder, and take it to rid your body of any poison and tone up the system. It will save much suffering and life. "It is a safe and reliable medicine, and a great preventive of sickness."—Rev. Jas. Rollins, Fairfield, Va.

—Our item about the early history of the B. & O. road reminds us that Mrs. McClellan's father, Samuel Long, then a young man, was present, at the breaking of the first ground for the road, by Charles Carrol, as noted in the item and often alluded to the fact that he had seen one of the signers of the Declaration.

—During the past week some extensive repairs have been going on at the Olds Bros. store. The rear room has been fitted up for wall paper and new cases have been put in and the wallpaper department now has the appearance of a city store. Their selection of patterns for the spring trade has been made after considering well the wants of the public. A visit to their store will convince you that they have an up-to-date stock of wall paper as well as a full line of China, Glass and Queensware, Dry Goods, notions, etc.

—The ancient Olympic Games are to be revived in Greece next month after having been omitted about 3000 years. The old tracks or course, has been cleaned of the earth that had convered it, and everything else put into about the same shape the ancients had it. There will be foot races, pitching quoits, etc. Ten young athletes from colleges in this country are now on their way over there to take part in the games. The chances are that more wonderful feats of skill and strength will be shown now, than in the old days.

Congress has positively done nothing but pass useless resolutions and quarrel, except such part of their valuable time as they have put in abusing various parties in various parts of the world. This state of things was nicely hit off the other day by a cartoon in the Chicago Record, an independent republican paper. Various members of both houses of congress were drawn up in line and were firing target guns at pictures on the wall. One picture was Cleveland, another was Spain, another was Gen. Weyler, another was John Bull, and so on, with Carlisle, Bayard and Secretary Morton. Each one was well peppered with shot, but not a moment's time was given to the enactment of needed laws.

OBITUARY.

Mittie Nina only child of Mr. and Mrs. Edd Pugsley was born Aug 23, 1894 and departed this life Feb. 25, 1896 age 1 year 6 month and 2 days. The funeral was held at the house Feb. 27 and interment in the Spencerville cemetery, Rev. J. Hootman officiating.

"How we miss our Baby darling,
Passed away from earth so soon
Bud of beauty rare unfolded
Faded e'er it came to bloom."
We will yield our tender infant
To the Savior's bosom now,
Feeling that His hand in blessing,
Loving rests upon its brow.
By and by beyond the river,
When our waiting shall be o'er,
We will praise the glorious Giver,
There our lost one to restore.

ANOTHER CURE.

AUBURN, IND., March 21, 1896.

Our little boy Eddie has always been sickly and puny and at times has had so much distress with his rupture, we thought he would die and so did his physician, who recommended us to take him to Dr. Casebeer for a cure. We did so, and he is now well after two treatments and growing fat and hearty. We are very much pleased with the Dr. and his treatment. 13-14

Dr. Wood, of Angola, is treating Daniel Stroh, but the latter is no better.

Mr. Knisely has been ill with the grip, but Dr. Carpenter reports him nearly well.

Rev. Erlougher, pastor of the M. E. church here is well liked. Sunday he preached the last sermon of the year and there were five new members added. He is now at conference.

Mrs. Phil Plum has been at Auburn a good deal lately, with her mother, who is now some better.

SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR

THE BEST SPRING MEDICINE

is SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR—don't forget to take it. The Liver gets sluggish during the Winter, just like all nature, and the system becomes choked up by the accumulated waste, which brings on Malaria, Fever and Ague and Rheumatism. You want to wake up your Liver now, but be sure you take SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR to do it. It also regulates the Liver—keeps it properly at work, when your system will be free from poison and the whole body invigorated.

You get THE BEST BLOOD when your system is in A1 condition, and that will only be when the Liver is kept active. Try a Liver Remedy once and note the difference. But take only SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR—it is SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR which makes the difference. Take it in powder or in liquid already prepared, or make a tea of the powder; but take SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR. You'll find the RED Z on every package. Look for it.

JAMES A. BARNES, - - - PROPRIETOR.

Queen Victoria says that "the Government of the United States have, etc." What's the matter with the Queen's English?

Unless there are two belligerent forces in Cuba, which Spain denies, what possible obligation of neutrality can there be upon us?

A Kentucky genius has invented an automatic bartender; but what that State seems to need most just now is an automatic undertaker.

"Love is the current from a powerful dynamo," remarks Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Yes; but the divorce courts show that the wires are badly crossed.

A Detroit man has invented a machine which turns out needles at half the present cost of manufacture. There are a great many points in its favor.

A New York Theosophist declares that the coming man will have three eyes. He probably will need an extra one to keep track of the new woman.

It is possible the dissensions in the Salvation Army may be healed even if Poet Laureate Austin can be prevailed upon to keep his muse from mixing up in the affair.

Now the New York papers are discussing the guilt or innocence of "Bat" Shea. As Mr. Shea was electrocuted, a popular verdict in his favor would leave him in a most unpleasant position.

The main trouble with flying machines is said to be to get sufficient impetus at the start, and to land with reasonable safety. Passengers will be particularly interested in the latter requirement.

Spain denies that there is any war in Cuba. How, then, can there be any obligation on the part of our government to interfere with perfect freedom of intercourse between our citizens and anybody in that island?

Spain lost Mexico and all the rest of the Spanish American republics by the greed and oppression that came in with the first despot. In governing a colony Spain is as clearly a case of arresting civilization as China.

A Perry, O. T., father-in-law who was thrashing the young man who had become his son-in-law without first securing parental consent was struck in the head with a stick of wood wielded by his new relative and instantly killed. This exemplifies the beauties of the Eastern method of castigating a son-in-law through the press, thereby doing away with the danger and at the same time managing to get a nice little bit of judicious advertising.

An almost unexampled sight in literature, and surely one of the strangest and saddest, is the publication of the posthumous works of a living man. This is being shown to the world by Naumann, the Leipzig publisher, who has just sent out the first two volumes of the works of Friedrich Nietzsche. Seven years ago Nietzsche began to be affected by a general paralysis. He was at first sent to a maison de sante, but afterward was taken back to his paternal home, where he has been cared for by his mother and sister. Little by little his mind and even his reason have faded out, and he has sunk beneath the level of the lower animals. Until lately, although he had become dumb and all thought was extinct in him, still he was able to walk about and to sit at table, and when his name was spoken he would sometimes look up. Now the last ray of intelligence is gone, and what was once one of the keenest and strongest philosophic minds of our day is merum silentium.

At last it is reported from Philadelphia that Keely has succeeded in harnessing a real force in a real manner and will apply for letters patent on his invention as soon as he recovers from the effects of a recent accident. This is suspicious, even if auspicious, seeing that for the large part of an ordinary lifetime the stockholders in the Keely Motor Company have been entertained at intervals with a statement that in a little while a valuable discovery of his would be made public. Of course, the fact that hope to them has been deferred so many times and so long as to make the heart sick and the pocketbook lean is no proof Keely will not conquer at the last, but it may well be reason for refusing to believe till proof to the contrary is furnished. The stockholders will merit hearty congratulations if it be found that their persistence is rewarded. In that event it will be a fortunate accident for them, whatever be the result to the world at large. But if Keely really has stumbled upon a small part of what he is alleged to have been hunting for all these years the result may be an astounding one, no less than a revolutionizing of the theory of force and its application to supplying the wants of man. Yet a little while and it will be known whether this is the latest in a long series of broken promises or a justification of Keely's claims before the world.

Charles Carleton Coffin, a well-known author and newspaper correspondent, died in Boston recently. His public service began as correspondent of the Boston Journal during the war of the rebellion, and he subsequently served as correspondent for the same paper during the Franco-Prusian war. Mr. Coffin's letters from the South were always clear, accurate and reliable, and it added to their value that he had had preliminary training in engineering, telegraphy, and military matters. He was one of a group of brilliant correspondents, including Joseph McCullagh, Junius Henri Browne, Colburn, Richardson and Thomas Knox (lately deceased) who left Cairo with the fleet in the spring of 1862, but none among them wrote more brilliant and interesting letters than those by Coffin, which appeared over the familiar signature of "Carleton." The knowledge which he gained in these experiences he subsequently put to good use in preparing an admirable series of war books for young people, which have been deservedly popular and successful. He was not only an excellent journalist, but an exemplary citizen, and always took a leading part in all municipal reform movements in his native city, while as a member of the Legislature he performed equally useful service for the State.

A discovery of extreme interest has recently been made in the science of photography which appears to leave no doubt that pictures are formed on the retina of the living eye, which can be photographed from the eye after the object which formed the picture has been removed from view. The experiments which have resulted in this discovery were made by W. Ingles Rogers, an amateur photographer, and are described in a recent number of Nature. The subject of the first experiment was a shilling-piece. Mr. Rogers looked at the shilling for an entire minute. Then, having shut out some of the daylight from the room by means of a yellow screen, he looked for forty-three minutes intently at a photographic plate, endeavoring during this time to keep in mind the appearance of the coin and think of nothing else. The second experiment, made in the presence of three other persons, was still more remarkable in its result. A postage-stamp was substituted for the shilling as the subject of observation, and was looked at for the same length of time—one minute. In this case the experimenter gazed at the photograph plate for twenty minutes only. There is said to be an absence of detail in the picture which was developed from this plate, but Nature declares that "sufficient was seen to prove beyond doubt that the picture of an object impressed upon the retina can send out vibrations which will result in the production of an image upon a sensitive plate."

There has just been a farmer's insurance convention held in Chicago and if one of the papers read to that body comes within any immediate vicinity of the truth there is a new and very puzzling factor introduced in the financial problem now agitating this country. The speaker was H. F. Stapel, who is an acknowledged statistical authority with the mutual companies. He spoke from the text: "God bless the rich corporations, the poor people can steal;" and under this satirical title, which served him as a special pleader, he made some very startling statements. He asserts that if seven of the old line companies of the "level premium" persuasion keep right on flourishing for the next twenty years as they are now doing, they will practically control the monetary affairs of this nation. Mr. Stapel produced figures intended to show that the insurance companies of the East take more money from the West in the shape of interest and premiums than the East pays the West for all her grain and other products. Of course he speaks of these venerable organizations as monopolists and highway robbers, whose presidents become millionaires and who cover a multitude of sins by conscientiously maintaining a surplus, but these things are in the nature of denunciation rather than argument or fact. What the situation demands is that these seven companies be looked up and brought into court. If Mr. Stapel has not made some unpardonable blunder in his figures, he has caught all the distinguished financiers napping. If the West is being impoverished as stated, if we are constantly paying out more than we are taking in and all the extortion yields wealth to these seven companies, there is but one thing to do and it cannot be done too soon. It is not to be thought of that a few insurance organizations are to control the money of the United States, and, as the statistician puts it, own us all.

An Indian Wizard.

The late Garrick Mallery, of the Bureau of Ethnology, once told me of something quite unaccountable which he witnessed at White Earth in 1890. There was present a famous mystery man, who made a bet with a local Government agent that the latter could not tie him with ropes in such a manner that he would not be able to disengage himself offhand. The agent, assisted by Mallery and other white men, tied the Indian up in the most elaborate fashion and put him inside a conical wigwam in the middle of an open space. Nobody else was permitted to come near him. As quickly as they had withdrawn, tremendous thumping sounds were heard from the hut, which swayed from side to side as if it would be torn to pieces. Two or three minutes later the Indian called out, telling them to go to a certain house several hundred yards away, where they would find the ropes with all the complicated knots untied. The tying committee opened the wigwam then, but found the wizard smoking a pipe, with his black magic stone on his lap. Neither pipe nor stone had been there previously. The head priest of the wizard's society, having heard of this exhibition, sent word that he would be killed if he repeated such a performance for gain. Evidently it was deemed improper that religious business of that sort should be thus prostituted.—Philadelphia Times.

Capture of Rare Birds.

Two rather interesting birds have arrived at the London Zoological Gardens. These are two young specimens of the king penguin, which may grow, should fortune favor them, to a height rather more than three feet. These penguins come from the Antarctic regions, and when the large species was first discovered the discoverers thought that the land was inhabited by a lot of nice children, neatly attired in pinafores, for the white breast of the bird, tied round the neck, as it were, by a white line, gives this impression.

How Silk Is Wound.

The thread on the cocoon of the silk worm is not wound around and around, as might be supposed, but irregularly here and there, as the worm moved his head to and fro within his self-made house. Many yards of thread may sometimes be unwound from the cocoon without turning it over at all.

POLITICS OF THE DAY

THE M'KINLEY CAMPAIGN.

The leading features of McKinley's plan of campaign have now been quite clearly disclosed. When his managers appealed a few weeks ago to prominent protected manufacturers in Pennsylvania for generous contributions of money—to be used, it should be borne in mind, not for the promotion of party success, but for McKinley himself in the canvass of convention delegates—the Ohio man's agents forgot to reckon with Mr. Quay, who exercised some influence in that State and is also a candidate for the nomination. This explains the somewhat embarrassing exposure of the fact that McKinley's agents asked these manufacturers for money to be used in holding Southern delegates who were inclined to repudiate early bargains and accept the latest bid. At that time, however, it was supposed by those who were thus approached that McKinley's agents really intended to use the money in the South. A few days later it was ascertained, partly through the published complaint of Senator Cullom, that McKinley funds had been used freely and effectively in Illinois, and now the friends of other candidates are beginning to perceive that McKinley money is doing its work in almost every Northern State where a "favorite son's" prestige can be broken down by drawing men out of his "solid delegation."

McKinley and his barrel have even invaded this State to prevent Gov. Morton from having at St. Louis the solid support of the powerful delegation from New York. A "favorite son" who cannot enter the convention with every one of his State's delegates at his back is handicaped from the start. McKinley's agents have already broken more than one delegation upon which a candidate relied, and in some instances where they have not prevented a solid vote on the first ballot they have arranged for a diversion on the second.

A considerable part of the money to be used in paying the expenses of an attack upon Gov. Morton's forces appears to have been procured from the iron and steel manufacturers of the Mahoning and Shenango Valleys, which are situated partly in Northeastern Ohio and partly in Northwestern Pensylvania. One of our contemporaries says that Mahlon Chance, connected with both the New York Tribune and the American Protective Tariff League (an organization whose central office is in this city), has, with headquarters at Youngstown, Ohio, since Feb. 27, been collecting the funds which are to be, or already have been, used for the promotion of McKinley's interests in this State. The individual contributions have ranged between $100 and $500, the understanding having been that the money was to be spent in New York for McKinley against Morton. One manufacturer, it is related, when asked to give $150, declined to do so. He was a supporter of McKinley, but, he said, he "did not believe in fighting the candidate of New York in New York with Ohio money."

The manufacturers were told, it is stated by one of them, that the New York Tribune would "warmly support McKinley to beat Gov. Morton." All who read the Tribune have found that out, although it should be said that our neighbor has the excuse of its quarrel with Platt. The Tribune's columns every day show plainly that it is hard at work for McKinley.

We should like to know what the rank and file of the Republican party think of this use of money in the interest of McKinley, at this stage of the proceedings, three months before the assembling of the nominating convention—the commercial organizing or Southern delegations in his support, the invasion of States where "favorite sons" believe they are fairly entitled to solid delegations, the appeals to protected manufacturers for large contributions, the collection of funds in the Ohio iron and steel district to be used in New York, and all the other indications of a desire and purpose to profit by the purchase of votes. As a rule, the rank and file know nothing about these things; they are simply required to thrown up their hats for "protection." But there are many, nevertheless, to whose knowledge these things do come. What do they think about them?

So far as our observation goes, there has never been a more scandalous canvass for delegates' votes made by a man seeking the nomination of his party for the Presidency. Honest and well-informed Republicans should ask themselves not only what must be the uses for which so much money is required by a candidate three months before the convention, but also from what sources it comes to him, to what extent he places himself under obligations to those who give it, in what way the givers expect to be repaid, and whether an aspirant who pursues such a course while delegates are being chosen is fit to hold any high office or deserves the votes of honest men.

Better Business at Tacoma.

The export business done at the port of Tacoma in February was the largest of any preceding month since business has been done there. Central America, South Africa, Japan and China take the bulk of the exported products. A Japanese Consulate has been established at Tacoma, with a view to the enlargement of trade between Japan and the United States and the eventual establishment of regular lines of steamers. We observe by the recent report of the Tacoma Chamber of Commerce that Mr. Miki Gaito, the Japanese Consul upon application, has been unanimously elected to membership in that body. Despite the anxieties of the Protectionists, the Japanese, who have been dubbed the Yankees of the Orient, and the Yankees who have built up the pushing cities on Puget Sound will establish a mutually profitable trade. The Japanese will send us silk, teas and camphor, and we will send them back flour, lumber, cotton and, as trade shall increase, an increasing quantity of our manufactured products as well as of our raw materials.

The future prosperity of the Pecific States depends upon the development of trade with the countries to the southward and westward upon the shores of the Pacific ocean. This growing trade is now mainly carried in vessels of other nations, our people having found it impossible to do business under the restrictions imposed by our Navigation laws. But this condition cannot always continue. Our own Pacific trade, at least, ought to be carried by our own ships. As the Pacific States shall become fully imbued and informed as to the magnitude of their maritime interests and opportunities they will cease to be the supporters of a national policy which tends to cripple and circumscribe commercial enterprise.—Philadelphia Record.

Public business suspended to enable the advance agents to boom the leading candidates.—Chicago Chronicle.

Consistent McKinleyites.

A bill has been introduced in the New York State Legislature to prohibit the use of foreign wood, asphalt, or other materials in making pavements in that State. The purpose of the proposed law is to shut out Trinidad asphalt, and a species of Australian wood which has recently been used in New York City, and thus give the owners of American asphalt mines and wood suitable for paving blocks a complete monopoly.

The friends of this measure are more consistent than the protectionists in Congress, who want to shut out foreign goods by high tariff taxes. If the competition of imported asphalt or wood is an injury to the American people, it is only a half way remedy to impose heavy duties on those articles. Absolute prohibition is the simplest and surest way of protecting the home producer. Of course the home consumers might kick and say that they did not want to be compelled to pay the high prices which would be charged by the men who controlled the domestic product. But the people, who buy things are never considered when tariffs are being raised, so their complaints need not be listened to. If the State of New York decided to prohibit the use of foreign asphalt and paving blocks, it will set a grand example for the McKinleyites of the whole country.

Why McKinley Is Strong.

The Chicago Tribune, which insists upon tariff reductions at odd times when it does not urge a prohibitive tariff, complains because McKinley has the suport of all Republicans "who believe it is impossible to get too much of a good thing." "These McKinley Republicans," says the Tribune, "include all those members of the Republican party who believe that a tariff which creates and fosters trusts is a good thing."

If all these Republicans are conceded to McKinley, the favorite sons would as well withdraw. The radical protectionists who foster trusts under the name of infant industries comprise nine-tenths of the Republican politicians. They may believe Reed or Allison is for trust-building protection, but they know beyond all disputing how McKinley stands.

And this is not a year to try experiments.—St. Louis Republic.

Do High Taxes Make Low Prices?

"There is not an article that we make to-day, made possible by a protective tariff, that has not been cheapened by protection to the American consumer."—Hon. Wm. McKinley.

If this is true, why does Major McKinley and the high tariff press denounce the Wilson tariff because they say it has lowered prices? Protectionists claim that our wool growing industry was made possible by the tariff. Will the Ohio Major dare to tell the farmers of his State that their wool has been cheapened by protection?

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

Free Cuba will be prosperous and progressive Cuba. Spanish Cuba is never likely to be either prosperous or progressive, sententiously observes the New York World.

A chorus of 4,000 voices is now in process of organization at Washington to form the leading musical feature of the National Christian Endeavor Convention there in July. This chorus is to be known as "The '96 Convention Chorus."

Newspaperdom is fairly well represented in the United States Congress—by those engaged in makng law as well by those whose duty it is to report the proceedings of the lawmakers. There are twenty-seven editors, nine who have been engaged in the profession at one time, and four others who followed the printer's calling in former days.

As soon as it seemed likely that the newly discovered Rontgen rays might prove to be of value to the medical profession experiments were begun by many physicians and photographers with a view to determining the uses and limitations of the rays in surgery. The results in many cases have shown that the profession will reap great benefit from the X rays, especially in the direction of surgical diagnosis.

The French Government's new budget shows that a step has been taken in the direction of State socialism. Six hundred thousand francs have been voted to societies for the sick and aged, and 400,000 to societies for the relief of children. This foots up a million francs, the same sum voted to the missions that will represent France at the coronation of the Czar, as the previous vote of 975,000 francs has been increased.

The followers of Menelek, King of Shoa, while not so large as the fierce Zulus are about the toughest warriors in the world. They do not know physical fear. A New York Press writer has seen a man jab a burnt stick several inches in his flesh without wncing. This apparent insensibility to pain is accompanied with a religious frenzy in battle that renders the soldiers unconscious of bodily harm. They have no fear of death and their happiness is to kill.

A curious application of the Rontgen rays has been made in France by Professor Buguet, of Rouen, and the chemist, M. Giscard. They took true and false diamonds for the experiment, and obtained entirely different results. When the rays were applied to the false diamonds only indistinct images appeared on the photographic plates. The real diamonds, however, allowed the rays to pass, and as a result, much darker pictures were produced on the plates. Thus a certain method of discovering the quality of diamonds is assured.

The attempt of the Italians to get possession of Abyssinia is not colonization at all, even if it succeeds, but conquest. It may not succeed. The population is only about three or four millions, but when a population of that size puts 100,000 fairly armed troops into the field in their own country, they're hard to beat. The Abyssians live in the mountains and love liberty. The height of their land keeps it cool and healthy, even under the equatorial sun. They are racially mixed. Some of them are descended from the old Coptic kings and from the Phoenicians, who once ruled all the Mediterranean. Others are the ordinary Ethiopians.

According to the New York Times, which prints a partial list of them, with the names of their owners, the number of their occupants and their street numbers, so far as they have any right to have such a number, there are about 2,500 rear tenements in New York city, occupied by over 50,000 people. These, says City and State, are peculiar breeding places of disease and crime. The law now forbids the building of any more of these rear or back lot houses, but the real problem is how to get rid of those now in existence. They are a terrible menace to the health and well-being, physical and moral, of the great city wherein they are found.

"A good many of the ignorant country people in Spain," says The Boston Transcript, "are very much more courteous to Americans than to English people, for the curious reason that they consider them subject also to the crown of Spain. It has been found in out-of-the-way villages near Gibraltar especially, where the English occupation of that fort is still looked upon as a temporary and offensive intrusion of foreigners on Spanish soil, that the whole tone of the people will change when it is found that a tourist is not English but American. 'Ah, I have a brother in Havana,' a grim-browed villager will say, with an inflection that implies that his American interlocutor must of necessity be from Cuba too."

Never let your passions get the better of your judgment. The following story will explain the propriety of this advice: A German farmer took a load of potatoes to the city to sell them. The jobbers offered him seven cents a bushel. That made him mad. So he drove down to the river front, backed his wagon into the water, pulled out the back board and dumped the whole load into the stream. Now, while this relieved the farmer of his wrath, likewise his team of their load, and made it unnecessary to haul the potatoes back many miles to his farm, the act of depositing vegetable matter in the river was in violation of a city ordinance. The farmer was arrested and fined $15 and costs, and went home a wiser man.

Dr. W. H. Dall, a member of the party of scientific men recently sent to Alaska to investigate the mineral resources of the country, has prepared a report on the subject, which will soon be published by the Geological Survey. Dr. Dall says that many valuable and extensive seams of coal exist about the harbors in Cook's inlet and elsewhere, so that it is easy to mine enough to run a steamer in a few minutes. The Alaskan coal is what is known as the brown variety. Its color is not brown, but when scratched it exhibits a brown streak. The finer qualities of this coal are much like anthracite and the broken edges are brilliant. The difference between the brown coal and the anthracite is that the former has a larger per cent. of volatile matter. Dr. Dall says that there is a great field for a mining company, for the cost of transportation from the mines to the steamers would be very small on account of the nearness of the mines to the coast.

The seventy-two races inhabiting the world communicate with each other in 3,004 different tongues, and confess to about 1,000 religions. The number of men and women is very nearly equal, the average longevity of both sexes being only thirty-eight years, about one-third of the population dying before the age of seventeen. Moreover, according to the most careful computation, only one person in 100,000 of both sexes attains the age of one hundred years, and only 6 to 7 in 100 the age of sixty. The total population of the earth is estimated at about 1,200,000,000 souls, or whom 32,214,000 die annually—i. e., an average of 88,848 a day, 4,020 an hour, and 67 a minute. The annual number of births, on the other hand, is estimated at 36,792,000—i. e., an average of 100,800 a day, 4,200 an hour, and 70 a minute. Generally, taking the entire world, married people live longer than single, and those who have to work hard for their living longer than those who do not, while also the average rate of longevity is higher among civilized than uncivilized races. Further, people of large physique live longer than those of small, but those of middle size beat both.

The amount of money handled by the Post Office Department in its money order business last year amounted to nearly $325,000,000. The Government allowed postmasters fees aggregating $450,000 on domestic and $3,000 on international business, and their incidental expenses were $148,000. The Government lost $14,000 through lost remittances and burglaries and $18,000 through bad debts. And still the money order business paid a net profit of $812,000. Twenty-two million people bought domestic money orders, and nearly a million people bought international money orders. The people of New York State shipped $13,000,000 through the Post Office department the people of Pennsylvania, $10,000,000; the people of Illinois, nearly $11,000,000. The people of the United States shipped more than $4,500,000 to England through the Post Office department; and more than $2,500,000 to Germany. Altogether the people of this country sent nearly $13,000,000 abroad by postal order, and received less than $6,000,000 through the same channel. But it is worthy of note that we sent nearly a million dollars less abroad last year than we did the year before.

PIRACY STILL EXISTS.

In the Chinese Seas the Old Trade Has Many Followers.

In the Malay Peninsula piracy has decreased considerably since the expedition of twenty years ago, but Perak, Sanlangore and Rambow still distinguish themselvis now and again by a little undisguised business of this kind. In China the two great hotbeds of buccaneers are the places which have been celebrated in this direction for centuries—Amoy and Canton.

The Amoy people proper, who speak the Amoy dialect, and live in the walled city, are very quiet, peaceable and orderly and have a pronounced antipathy for fighting, whether on sea or shore. But back of Amoy is the mountanous district of Tongan. It is connected with the ocean by many arms of the sea. Its soil is sterile and its resources are very few; its people, like all mountainers, are thin, muscular, brave and resolute. Even to-day they preserve a semi-independence of a military nature.

These are the gentlemen who make their living by piracy. They and the men of Canton have learned wisdom by experience. They no longer cruise the wide seas, attacking any craft that may come along. There are too many gunboats patrolling the coast—too many rifled guns and too many yard arms. Law and order, in the past half-century, have shot, hanged, drowned, blown up or burned at least 100,000 followers of the "black flag." To-day the work is done upon a smaller, but a far shrewder and safer, basis.

They keep spies at various places in their neighborhood, who report to headquarters whenever some junk is about to leave that has a rich cargo or carries a large amount of money. Along with this goes the information of who commands the boat, how large a crew it carries and how it is armed. The pirates then plan to intercept the craft in some river or arm of the sea, or else in some shoal water near the coast, where there is no chance of meeting a gunboat, and where, after the robbery, they will have a safe means of escape.

Their calculations are carefully made but come out right only once in four or five times. It may be that a foreign or Chinese gunboat suddenly appears upon the scene. It may be that the junk they are after goes past their rendezvous with a European steamer or a river launch, or mayhap the prospective victim is delayed by adverse winds and tides, and so does not appear at the time and place figured upon. When they do make a capture they are not so brutal and cruel as in the old years. For the rest, any one who knows China and the Chinese will not need to be told that the booty is easily disposed of without risks or questions asked.—Pall Mall Gazette.

A Marked Penny Turns Up.

In 1858 C. P. Bateman, then living in Minerva, Ky., cut his initials on a 25-cent piece and carried it for a pocket-piece for a year or two. Then he parted with it. Last week Capt. Monroe Bateman, of Columbia, Mo., a brother of C. P. Bateman, received the 25-cent piece in change from a neighbor living in that place. He is sure it is his brother's old pocket piece, because he remembers when the letters were cut in the coin, and various peculiarities about their form and position

400 SHOTS A MINUTE.

RECORD OF THE COLT AUTOMATIC GUN.

All You Have to Do Is to Tie the Trigger Back, and It Keeps Right on Firing—Its Weight Is Only Forty Pounds.

To Be First Tried in the Navy.

An automatic machine gun has recently been adopted by the government, which, after being set in motion, will fire 400 shots or more a minute so long as the cartridges hold out. All a soldier or sailor has to do is to fire one shot. Then he can tie back the trigger and go to dinner if he wants to, and the gun will keep firing away.

The gun in its recent tests at Indian Head, near Annapolis, was fired for a trial of its accuracy at a 200-yard range. It made 100 consecutive hits in 16 seconds. In the test for durability the gun was fired 8,000 times, and showed no signs of weakness or wear afterward. Such rapid strides have been made in ordnance and gunnery in the last fifteen years that it has been difficult for those whose election and calling was not the development of engines of destruction to "keep up with the procession." A gun that will shoot automatically is an interesting feature in the equipment of modern armies. The Maxim gun was the first self-firing gun. Now comes the Colt automatic gun.

The new Colt gun weighs about forty pounds, and can be carried by a cavalry trooper in a boot. The ease with which it can be transported and the fact that in action only one man is necessary to handle it are its great points of value. The fact that a squadron of cavalry can gallop off and by simply dismounting and setting up its Colt guns on tripods transform itself in a couple of minutes into an effective battery, each gun of which is sending forth 400 shots a minute, may put a new phase upon the battles of the future. In fighting in hilly or mountainous country, where the transportation of field artillery is always a matter of difficulty, the light weight of this gun makes it of especial value. The government will first try the gun in the navy. It will be mounted in the military tops and other places of vantage on the new cruisers and battleships, with the idea of sweeping the gunners on hostile ships from their positions. Four or five hundred shots a minute poured on a gun port or a barbette turret would make things uncomfortable for the men serving the hostile guns.

CARRIED BY A TROOPER.

In the Maxim gun, of which much has been said lately, the force of the recoil is made to do the work of extracting the shell, reloading and firing. In the Colt gun the automatic action is effected by the expansion of the powder gases in the barrel. On pulling the trigger the shot is fired, and after the bullet has passed a vent just back of the muzzle, and before its exit from the muzzle, the gases expand through this vent upon the piston and gas lever, which, in turn, works the breech mechanism, opening the breech, ejecting the shell and feeding to the gun another cartridge. The gas lever, returning, forces home the cartridge, closes and locks the breech and fires the gun. If the trigger be held back the same operation will be repeated as long as cartridges are supplied. The ammunition for the gun is carried in small boxes and fed to the gun by a belt. The belts of cartridges are coiled in the the boxes, and all that one has to do is to introduce the end of the belt into the breech of the gun, set it going and it fires away and feeds itself.

Lieut. Schofield's Case.

One of the most interesting cases of "physical disability" of an officer of the army—the more interesting because it has aroused so much comment among officers of the army itself—is that of Second Lieutendant H. McA. Schofield, a son of Lieut. General Schofield. He recently appeared before an examining board in San Francisco for promotion, and the medical board refused to pass him upon the ground of defective hearing. Then came the question whether or not his deafness constituted "incapacity to perform duty" in his present rank. The next step was to examine the records of his first examination, upon his original entry into the service, to learn whether or not deafness was then observed; but they were found to be clear on this point. On the other hand, some officers have said that Lieut. Schofield was slightly deaf before he entered the service, and if this fact is proved a complication may arise which will not only affect the military status of Lieut. Schofield but also the officers on his first board. If it is found that the disability originated in the line of duty then he will be entitled to be retired with the rank of First Lieutenant.

European Railway Lines.

The French Minister of Public Works has published a list of European railway lines. Germany comes first with 27,130 miles; France next with 23,711 miles. Great Britain and Ireland, with 20,347 miles, are followed by Russia with 19,420.

WHAT HEADACHE IS.

The Danger Signal that Nature Gives to Women.

It Signifies That Serious Female Trouble Is Imminent.

Most female diseases manifest their presence by a headache.

When a dull heavy ache in the head is accompanied by disordered stomach, bad taste in the mouth, dull eyes, pains in back and groins, lassitude, nervousness, despondency and irregularity, it is time to locate the trouble and remove it. We will tell you right now that the symptoms indicate positively that serious womb trouble is imminent.

Don't let this fearful disease get you in its power. If you are uncertain, write to Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass., giving full symptoms. Your letter will be read, acted upon and answered by one of your own sex, and without charge.

Note Mrs. Snyder's letter to Mrs. Pinkham.

"Before taking your remedies, day after day I would read the testimonials of women who had been cured by the use of your Vegetable Compound.

"At last I decided to write and tell you my condition.

"I had been examined by physicians who told me that my womb was very large and prolapsed, and also said there was a growth on the inside of the womb that must be cut out; menstruations were so painful that I suffered for three days of every month, and it was impossible to get any rest. For two months I used Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, Blood Purifier and Sanative Wash, and now I am entirely cured. I had suffered nine years, thinking there was no cure for me, and it only took five bottles of your remedies to cure me."—MRS. L. SNYDER, Trenton Junction, N. J.

Johnson's Modesty.

On the eve of leaving London for Canada, Mrs. Brooke, who wrote "The History of Emily Montague," the first novel written in Canada, gave a farewell party, Hannah More, Johnson, and Boswell being of the company. Dr. Johnson was obliged to leave early, and apparently departed after wishing his hostess health and happiness. Shortly after a servant whispered to Mrs. Brooke that a gentleman was waiting below to speak to her. Running down-stairs, the fair novelist found the venerable lexicographer.

"Madam," said he, ponderously, "I sent for you down-stairs that I might kiss you, which I did not choose to do before so much company."

The Greatest Medical Discovery of the Age.

KENNEDY'S MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

DONALD KENNEDY, OF ROXBURY, MASS.,

Has discovered in one of our common pasture weeds a remedy that cures every kind of Humor, from the worst Scrofula down to a common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both thunder humor). He has now in his possession over two hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston. Send postal card for book.

A benefit is always experienced from the first bottle, and a perfect cure is warranted when the right quantity is taken.

When the lungs are affected it causes shooting pains, like needles passing through them; the same with the Liver or Bowels. This is caused by the ducts being stopped, and always disappears in a week after taking it. Read the label.

If the stomach is foul or bilious it will cause squeamish feelings at first.

No change of diet ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it. Dose, one tablespoonful in water at bedtime. Sold by all Druggists

THE FIRST LADY.

Handsome Mrs. Cleveland Is as Popular as Ever.

Mrs. Cleveland's frequent social appearances lately have shown very clearly that the strong fascination which her presence always exerted among women has not lessened the veriest jot. She is the most interesting women in the country to-day, particularly in the fact that people never tire of looking at her. No one was ever yet heard to say that he had been able to watch her quite as long as he would have liked. A great many people now know her intimately and are able to see her frequently; but, for the great majority to whom this intimacy is denied, the only opportunities come with the important functions at the White House.

At one of Mrs. Cleveland's teas recently perhaps 1,000 women had the pleasure of shaking hands with her, and at the same time enjoyed a little chat. It would have been hard to find any woman in all this number who, after this enjoyment, did not find some point from which she could stand and feast her eyes again on her hostess. Every detail of her appearance, every ornament she wore, and every word she said was discussed and admired. In evening dress Mrs. Cleveland is the handsomest woman in Washington to-day. She has a beautiful neck and well-rounded shoulders, and, with the sparkle of her jewels, making a picture of a White House mistress which is simply regal. Her smile is contagious, for her

A NINE-FOOT MUSTACHE,

James H. Brown, of Idaho, Is the Possessor and Has No Rival.

James H. Brown, issue clerk at the Fort Hall agency, Ross Fork, Bingham County, Idaho, has the longest mustache of any man living. It measures nine feet from tip to tip, four and a half feet each way from the center of the lip. This mustache is Mr. Brown's greatest joy and pride. It is most carefully kept, and would attract marked attention anywhere. The Indians look upon this enormously long mustache with awe and reverence, believing Mr. Brown to have been exceptionally blessed by God.

Mr. Brown is by birth a Virginian. He was born in Loudoun County, eleven miles west of Leesburg, near what is known now as Round Hill. His father moved from Loudoun County to Barbour County, then in Virginia, but now in West Virginia, in October, 1857.

Mr. Brown's occupation has always been that of a farmer, with the exception of a period of eighteen years, which he devoted to the lumber business, and the time he has been giving to Uncle Sam. Fourteen months ago Mr. Brown was appointed issue clerk at the Fort Hall Indian agency, which position he is still filling.

The fame of Mr. Brown's elongated mustache is by no means confined to the wilds of Idaho. It is known throughout the Virginias and the South generally. The newspapers of the places of the towns visited by Mr. Brown have loudly extolled the wonderful length of his mustache, but this is the first time that a picture of the proud owner of the longest mustache in the world has ever been printed.—New York Journal.

The Beetle's Strength.

A note dentomologist who had been writing on the wonderful feats of strength as exhibited in the beetle family, tells the following: "I selected a common black water-beetle weighing four and two-tenth grains, and found that he was able to carry a load of shot in a small bag, the whole weighing eight and one-fourth ounces, or exactly 858 times the weight of the bug. If a man weighing 150 pounds could carry as much accordingly, he could shoulder a forty-five-ton locomotive, and then chain a train of cars together and take the whole lot across the country at a five-mile-an-hour gait.

Youthful Curiosity.

A case has been brought to the attention of the Dover (Me.) Observer in which the parents of a small boy were talking about hanging, and in the course of the conversation the method was described minutely. A little later the child went out, got a rope, and tying it to a beam, proceeded to experiment. He was so successful in his investigation that when he was found he was black in the face, and would have died soon.

The statement is made that 4,290 bushels of potatoes marketed at Gaylord, Mich., last week, brought $343.20 or but 8 cents a bushel.

SCIATIC RHEUMATISM AND ITS CURE.

From the Gazette, Burlington, Iowa.

The story of Mr. Tabor's nearly fatal attack of sciatic rheumatism is familiar to his large circle of acquaintances, but for the benefit of others and those similarly afflicted The Gazette has investigated the matter for publication. Mr. Tabor is secretary and treasurer for the Commercial Printing Company, with offices in the Hedge Block, and resides at 417 Basset street, Burlington, Ia. A Gazette man sought an interview with Mr. Tabor at his place of business to-day, and, although he was busily engaged with imperative duties, he talked freely and feelingly on the subject of his recent severe sickness and subsequent wonderful cure.

"Yes," said Mr. Tabor, "I can safely say that I am a well man, that is, my old trouble with rheumatism has entirely disappeared, but I am still taking Pink Pills and will keep on taking them as long as I continue to grow stronger and healthier, as I have been every day since I began to use them. You will not wonder at my profound faith in the merits of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People after you have heard what I have to tell you. About one year ago I was stricken suddenly with sciatic rheumatism and was confined to my bed. It grew worse and rapidly assumed the form of inflammatory rheumatism. I suffered constant and acute pains and all the tortures which that horrible disease is capable of inflicting. At length under the constant care of a local physician I was enabled to return to my work, but only at intervals. Severe attacks would appear regularly in my back and descend into my leg and foot, and threatened to make me a permanent cripple. I tried various remedies for rheumatism, but without any beneficial results. I grew pale, weak and haggard, and my family and friends grew alarmed at my condition.

"About eight weeks ago my mother induced me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, and you know the result. Before I had used one box I felt greatly relieved and much stronger. I continued their use and improved rapidly. I have now taken eight boxes and feel like a new man and completely cured, all of which is due to the efficacy of Pink Pills. They are invigorating and thoroughly wholesome, and have helped me in every way."

In reply to inquiries Mr. Henry, the druggist, stated that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills were having a large sale, that it was particularly gratifying to him to know that the customers themselves were highly pleased with the benefits they had derived from their use; that many of them stated that the pills were the only medium that had done them any good; that they not only gave quick relief but permanent benefit. That the pills do sell and that the pills do cure is a certainty.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills contain, in a condensed form, all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are also a specific for troubles peculiar to females, such as suppressions, irregularities and all forms of weakness. Pink Pills are sold only in boxes at 50c. a box or six boxes for $2.50, and may be had of all druggists, or direct by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

A Freak of Nature.

E. B. Wingate, of Shelbyville, Ind., has at his house a real curiosity, one that will attract the attention of men engaged in raising fruits. Early in the fall Mrs. Wingate requested her husband to get a stick of some kind for her which she desired to place in a flower pot to support a growing plant. Mr. Wingate, for want of something better, cut a short limb off of a May cherry tree, which was used for the purpose above indicated. A few weeks afterward it was noticed the buds on the cherry limb were swelling, and that it looked as bright and lively as the bark of such a tree should in the early spring. The plant in the pot was watered regularly and given proper treatment regardless of the limb at its side, which continued to develop its buds. Mr. Wingate called the attention of numerous people to this freak, determining now to closely watch it. Strange as it may appear, this cherry limb now has one bloom on it, and other buds that will open.

Use for Old Corks.

Corks are thrown away in great quantities, and very few people think that there is any value attached to that material after it has served its purpose once as a stopper of a bottle. Nevertheless it has become one of the most valuable components of a city's refuse. Great quantities of used corks are now used again in the manufacture of insulating covers of steam pipes and boilers, points to be protected from the influence of heat. Powdered cork is very useful for filling in horse collars, and the very latest application of this material is the filling in of pneumatic tires with cork shavings. Mats for bathrooms are made of cork exclusively, and it also goes into the composition of linoleum. Cheap life preservers are now filled exclusively with bottle stoppers, cut into little pieces.—Scientific American.

Europe's Holdings in Africa.

Within the scope of a magazine article it is impossible to describe the steps which France, Germany, and Italy severally took. A sufficient idea, however, may be gained by the casual reader of what has been done when I say that within the last ten years France has acquired of Equatorial Africa about 300,000 square miles, in which there are now 300 Europeans; Germany, 400,000 square miles; Italy, 547,000 square miles, and Portugal has now a defined territory extending over 710,000 square miles. France, moreover, has been active farther north, in the Sahara and in West Africa, and claims rights over 1,600,000 square miles; while Germany, in Southwest Africa and the Cameroons, asserts her rule over 540,000 square miles.—Century.

It Makes Such a Difference.

A Linn Grove girl found a package of love letters that had been written to her mother by her father before they were married, says the Sioux Rapids Republican. The daughter saw that she could have a little sport, and read them to her mother, substituting her own name for that of her mother and a fine young man for that of her father. The mother jumped up and down in her chair, shifted her feet, seemed terribly disgusted, and forbade her daughter having anything to do with a young man who would write such sickening and nonsensical stuff to a girl. When the young lady handed the letters to her mother, to read the house became so still that one could hear the grass growing in the back yard.

This Was Long Ago.

In one of the letters of Grui Patin, written in 1645, the learned bibliophilist says: "It is true that there is here an Englishman, the son of a Frenchman, who proposes to make carriages that will roll from Paris to Fontainebleau without horses in a day. The new machine is preparing in the Temple. If it should succeed there will be a great saving of hay and oats, which are at present extremely costly."

Webster's Ready Mind.

Once, when Daniel Webster was addressing a political meeting in Faneuil Hall, the standing multitude within the hall, pressed by those who were endeavoring to enter from without, began to sway to and fro, a solid mass of human bodies, as helpless to counteract the movement as if Faneuil Hall were being rocked by an earthquake. The orator was in the midst of a stirring appeal, urging the necessity of individual exertion and unflinching patriotism to avert the dangers that threatened the political party whose principles he espoused, when he perceived the terrible swaying of the packed assembly and the imminent danger that might ensue. Webster stopped short in the middle of a sentence, advanced to the edge of the platform, extended his arm in an authoritative attitude, and, in a stentorian voice of command, cried out:

"Let each man stand firm!" The effect was instantaneous. Each man stood firm; the great heaving mass of humanity regained its equilibrium, and, save the long breath of relief that filled the air, perfect stillness ensued. "That," exclaimed the great orator, "is what we call self-government!"

A Hygienic Exposition.

United States Consul Rawicz of Warsaw, Poland, reports that a second hygienic exposition similar to the first, held in 1887, wtll be held at that place from May 15 to July 15, 1896. The following list of the nine committees now at work and who report that much interest is being shown by the people will give an idea of the scope of the exposition: First, physico-chemical; second, parisital; third, architectural; fourth, pedagogical; fifth, on hygiene of industry; sixth, on hospitals; seventh, pharmaceutical; eighth, statist cal; and ninth, public hygiene.

Each of the above committees is composed of at least three members, selected from among the doctors of medicine, professors, engineers, and other specialists under the presidency of the general committee.

Miss Anthony's Autographs.

Hereafter the people who want the autograph of Miss Susan B. Anthony will have to pay for it. She is asked for her autograph thousands of times each year, and Mrs. Thomas, of Maryland, suggested during the woman's suffrage meeting that as autographs of this kind bore a commercial value a bureau of autographs be established at national headquarters, where supplies of autographs of noted women of the suffrage cause will be sold for a consideration, and the money turned over to the association fund.

Battle Won After Death.

The battle won by a king after his death was the victory achieved by people of the Cid, in Spain. Three days after the death of the Cid his capital was attacked by the Moors in great forces. His people washed and dressed the body, clad in a suit of the finest mail, tied it on a horse and, surrounding it by a brilliant cavalcade of officers and attendants, went forth to battle. The Moors were panic-stricken and fled in dismay.

The Unkindest Cut of All,

As Shakspeare says, is to poke fun or sneer at people who are nervous, under the half-belief that their complaint is imaginary or an affectation! It is neither, but a serious reality. Imperfect digestion and assimilation of the food is a very common cause of nervousness, especially that distressing form of it which manifests itself in want of sleep. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters speedily remedies nervousness, as it also does malarial, kidney, bilious and rheumatic ailments. The weak gain vigor speedily through its use.

The Bladder-Wort.

One of the most curious enemies of British fresh water fishes is a small floating water reed—the bladder-wort. Along its branches are a number of small green vesicles or bladders, which, being furnished with tiny jaws, seize upon the little fish, which are assimilated into its substance. This is a subtle poacher, the true character of which has only lately been detected.

Bargains in Carriages and Harness.

Intending purchasers of carriages, phaetons and buggies would do well to write to the Elkhart Carriage and Harness Manufacturing Co. at Elkhart, Indiana, for their new catalogue. These manufacturers deal directly from their factory with consumers, and have customers from Maine to California to whom they ship and sell at factory prices. Their work is good and honest, while their prices, considering quality and finish, are so reasonable as to attract attention wherever their carriages are sold. Their advertisement in another column explains their methods of dealing with purchasers.

To Bunch Schoolhouses.

Pennsylvania proposes to abandon the "district school" in rural localities—famous as the "little red schoolhouse"—and bunch the schools in the middle of each township.

Never turn a blessing round to see whether it has a dark side to it.

Sour

Stomach, sometimes called waterbrash, and burning pain, distress, nausea, dyspepsia, are cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla. This it accomplishes, because, with its wonderful power as a blood purifier, Hood's Sarsaparilla gently tones and strengthens the stomach and digestive organs, invigorates the liver, creates an appetite, gives refreshing sleep, and raises the health tone. In cases of dyspepsia and indigestion it seems to have a "magic touch."

"For over 12 years I suffered from sour with severe pains across my shoulders, and great distress. I had violent nausea, which would leave me very weak and faint, difficult to get my breath. These spells came oftener and more severe. I did not receive any lasting benefit from physicians, but found such happy effects from a trial of Hood's Sarsaparilla that I took several bottles, and mean to always keep it in the house. I am now able to do all my own work, which for six years I have been unable to do. My husband and son have also been greatly benefited by Hood's Sarsaparilla—for pains in the back, and after the grip. I gladly recommend this grand blood medicine." MRS. Deafness Cannot Be Cured by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars; free.

Democratic Platform.

There is a good deal of sparring back and forth between republicans and democrats, populists and silver men, about the wording of the last national democratic platform on the silver question. One faction says it meant free silver, and the other says it meant a silver dollar of the same commercial or intrinsic value of a gold dollar. distinctly says "intrinsic value," in which case we would have to make our silver dollar twice as big as it now is. But here is that part of the platform. Read it:

We denounce the republican legislation known as the Sherman act of 1890, as a cowardly makeshift, fraught with possibilities of danger in the future, which should make all of its supporters, as well as its author, anxious for its speedy repeal. We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal, or charge for mintage, but the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value or be adjusted through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as shall insure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets, and in payment of debt; and we demand that all paper currency shall be kept at par with and redeemable in such coin. We insist upon this policy as especially necessary for the protection of the farmers and laboring classes, the first and most defenseles victims of unstable money and and a fluctuating currency.

Southern Flowers.

Yesterday the express brought the editor a large box of lovely and fragrant flowers, fresh from the gardens and fields of Texas. They were sent by Mrs. Belle Dilgard, wife of David Dilgard, at San Antonio, Texas. Enclosed was a letter in which she alluded to the report that the newly discovered comet was to strike some where in Texas that afternoon, and she hoped the flowers might reach Indiana in safety, whatever became of Texas. These flowers were gathered in open air, some being wild ones, and some from gardens. They were laurel, "blue Bettie" and other wild flowers, with roots of Mexican pulque, laurel beans, etc. etc. There is also some valuable instructions as to treating cactus plants. They need sun and poor soil, but not much water. The whole assortment is lovely, and also most of them new here. She has our thanks, also for fine Marshal Neil, Pride of Texas, Louis Phillips roses. We expect to make the "divide" with Neil Husselman, and his mother and Mrs. Mary McEnterfer. The most characteristic part of the letter is the allusion to the "Freak" that we published an item about a week or two ago. We thought at the time, it would attract the attention of the people down that way. Mrs. Dilgard says all are well, and, though they will always have a warm side for Indiana, they like Texas better.

Poor Economy

By all means be economical, but don't be too economical where health or life is concerned. The matter of a few cents should never count between the old, standard and reliable preparations and the new, obscure, and in many cases, almost worthless substitutes.

SCOTT'S Emulsion

of Cod-liver Oil and Hypophosphites is as much the standard for all conditions of wasting in children and adults where the lungs are weak or affected, as quinine is the standard for malarial fevers. When you go to a store to get Scott's Emulsion, don't be fooled into taking something else they say "is just as good." It isn't. Scott's Emulsion has gained its reputation by its superior merit, and nothing of its kind has ever equalled it. Your doctor will tell you that.

All druggists sell Scott's Emulsion. Two sizes—50 cents and $1.00.

Commissioners' Court.

The Board, had a number of new matters before it, at its recent session, the most of which was fully disposed of. We were not able to publish it last week owing to the amount of space we had to give up to the cases in court.

Geo. E. Gage was appointed justice of the peace in Keyser township; Fred. April was appointed justice in Stafford township.

Lorenzo Taylor, of Angola; and Charles F. Taylor, of Ft Wayne, representing Geo. W. Beers were granted the privilege of putting up telephone poles along roads, provided they were so placed as not to interfere with private or public interests.

Petition of many citizens of Butler township, asking the Board to rescind its order of June 12, 1889, allowing mich cows to run at large, was presented. Petition granted.

Vincent C. Bronson was appointed coroner of DeKalb county. He was elected at the November election 1894, and failed to qualify within the time allowed by law. Dr. F. M. Hines was awarded the contract to doctor the poor of the county for one year beginning April 15, 1896, for $800. This includes treatment at the County Home.

Ira C. Rohm, son of John Rohm was permitted to be sent to the asylum for feeble minded, the father paying a fourth of the expenses.

The Board also decided to have painted all the iron bridges built previous to 1893.

They decided that a bridge must be erected across Fish Creek in Troy township, where the Bellefontain road crosses it. Also to build a bridge across the St. Joe river in Concord township at the point where the road going south from Butler crosses said stream.

The allowances for various purposes made by the Board at this March term as follows:

Those Groceries.

Farmers within a Radius of 10 Miles were Here after Groceries.

Friday's Daily.

The Dayton firm who advertised to deliver groceries here to-day are on deck. From eight o'clock this morning up to evening crowds of people were present after the groceries they had ordered. Farmers from near Auburn and even as far as 10 miles from Auburn were there. The reporter in conversation with an old neighbor from Jackson township learned that the groceries he had bought were no cheaper than they could get in Auburn but said they were of a better quality. The goods are all tied up in packages and the spices are in one and two pound cans. People of our town could be seen going and coming to the car with baskets. We notice several Auburn people carrying away their goods. Our grocerymen should flood the country with advertising matter and show the public that they sell better goods at even lower prices than the Dayton firm does.

The Festive Grocery Dealers From Dayton in Limbo.

Saturday's Daily.

There are statutes against selling impure groceries or impure food of any kind, or oil that has not been inspected by an Indiana inspector, and to-day noon, as the Dayton grocery dealer who has been raking in the dollars from our people, went to get on the train, he was arrested and brought into 'Squire Walter's court for trial for selling oil that had not been inspected in this state. It had the Ohio inspector's stamp on it all right but that was of no avail. The arrest was made at the instance of A. J. Burk who swore out a warrant and sent to Ft. Wayne for Inspector Theodore Thorward, who is inspector for the 12th Congressional District. Th arrest was by Marshal West, and a hearing came up this afternoon. The penalty is a fine of $50 to $3.90 and imprisonment in the county jail not more than six months.

—As we go to press, the trial has not come off, as they are waiting on the accused who has sent to his house at Dayton, for instructions. We suppose when word comes from there he will eithet plead guilty or fight the case, as they may direct.

Monday's Daily.

We went to press, as stated Saturday while the matter was hanging fire in in Justice Walter's court. The man arrested for selling oil not inspected under the laws of Indiana, was J. S. Sink. While he was waiting to hear from his house, he engaged Judge McClellan to be his attorney. On hearing from Dayton, he concluded not to stand a trial before justice as the fine not being less than $50 would put the matter into the circuit court. So he gave bonds of $150, for his appearance at court and put up the money. He then took the north bound evening train to Goshen where he is to deliver a stock of goods to-day, similar to those taken here. We learn that Mr. Yard west of town is one of the men who bought the kerosene oil. He is also liable to a fine for using oil that has not been inspected by the legal inspector of this district. So he also is liable to be called into court. It is also probable that the suits here will start the ball rolling and there will be suits in other counties, as this syndicate is selling all over the state. They admit that their goods are no better than those sold by retailers, and that their prices are "sometimes" as high, but say they are in the business to "do the farmers some good." Just how much "good," is shown by the comparison of cost in our article.

How the Dayton Syndicate Swindles De Kalb County Farmers.

Monday's Daily.

There was quite a ripple among our grocers, and in fact the people generally, last week, where the several car loads of groceries were delivered here by the big grocery syndicate at Dayton Ohio. The purchasers came and got their goods and paid for them. Later on, one of the dealers was arrested, as stated in an article elsewhere in this paper, for selling oil that had not been inspected as required by the laws of Indiana. But the most interesting part is to come. And this is a comparison of the prices paid to these strangers and what the same bill of goods would cost if bought of our home grocers. This comparison is the valupart of the whole transaction. One of our grocers was called on by one of the victims, and shown his bill of goods, and the prices he had paid. We have obtained a copy of this bill and now publish it, and the Auburn prices for the same.

	Dayton Price	Auburn Price
2lb B. F. Tea	$1 60	90
2lb Roast Rio coffee	45	44
2lb Baking Powder	24	20
2lb Pepper	50	40
2lb Cinnamon	96	40
½lb Nutmeg	32	18
10lb Rice	50	40
10lb Rolled Oats	25	25
5lb Raisons	20	20
5lb Peaches	50	40
1lb Soda	05	08
5lb Tapioca	35	35
1 Gallon Harness Oil	90	90
Totals	$6 82	$5 10
Add freight	29
	7 11	5 10

In other words, the farmer who bought this bill of these strangers could have had the same amount of each kind of goods, and of at least as good quality of our home grocers for $2.01 less money.

Besides this, some bills were very much different from the above, but all no doubt paid a higher price than the things were worth. The home price we give above is for one grocer only, but with an experience of years in buying of all these grocers, we believe there is little or no difference in the prices they sell at. It will pay our grocers to publish their list of prices now and then and keep the farmers posted.

Dr. Miles' Heart Cure, Cures Heart Disease.

Mr. Geo. L. Smith, of the Geo. L. Smith Mantel Co., Louisville, Ky., writes Feb. 25, 1894: "For about a year I was a terrible sufferer from heart trouble, which got so bad I was obliged to sit up in bed to get my breath. I had to abandon business and could hardly crawl around. My friend, Mr. Julius C. Voght, one of our leading pharmacists, asked me to try Dr. Miles' Heart Cure. I had used little more than a bottle when the pain ceased and palpitations entirely disappeared. I have not had the slightest trouble since, and today I am attending to business as regularly as ever."

Horribly Burned.

E. A. Benedict Has Another, and Very Serious Accident This Afternoon.

At about two o'clock this afternoon Ernie Benedict met with a horrible accident at his factory. He was putting the enamel on a bicycle frame when the gasolene exploded. A brick oven is built on the second floor of their factory off of a small room. When the enamel is put on the bicycles he shuts himself in this room to be free from all dust. The oven is heated by gasolene and the bicycles put in the oven and this dries the enamel. In some way, not known to any one, the gasolene exploded.

It seems Mr. Benedict had the oven door open as the lock was not broken in any way to show that it had been blown open. The door to the small room was broken from its hinges and all slivered up, the partition to the room was moved out about two inches From the way things were torn to pieces we cannot see how Mr. Benedict got out alive. He was first seen crawling out of the room on his hands and knees. Both hands and his face are burned into a brown color. His left hand has a long gash cut in it. It is not known how this was done.

Dr. Swarts was called and with the assistance of others he was taken to his home, where the wounds and burns are being treated. The accident will probably lay Mr. Benedict up for weeks. He is certainly having his share of ill luck.

Tin Wedding

Eli gets there generally. In this case we refer to Eli Cochran, whose snug home on the Avenue was the scene, last evening, of a pleasant little gathering of neighbors. Mr. and Mrs. Cochran had been married ten years, and of all the anniversaries, this is the one generally produces the most fun. The neighbors on the Avenue furnished them all sorts of tinware and things, and then all settled down to an evening of enjoyment. There were numerous charades, and a lunch, as well as other items that make such meeting enjoyable. Among the callers, were J. E. Ensley and wife, R. E. Holler and wife, Joseph Stafford, wife and daughter Clara, J. R. Steves, wife and little Hazel Purinton, Nettie Jones, Vallie and Cora Case, and others.

First Ry. Whistles.

An exchange has an item throwing some light on this subject:

One day in the year of 1833, so runs a story of the origin of the locomotive whistle, a farmer was crossing the railroad track on one of the country roads with a load of eggs and butter. Just as he came on the track a train approached. The engineman blew his tin horn, but the farmer did not hear it. Eighty dozen of eggs and fifty pounds of butter were mingled with the kindling wood to which the wagon was reduced. The railway company had to pay the farmer the value of his fifty pounds of butter, his 960 eggs, his horse and his wagon. A director of the company went to George Stephenson to see if he could invent something that would give a warning more likely to be heard. Stephenson the next day had a contrivance which, when attached to the engine boiler and the steam turned on, gave out a shrill, discordant sound. The directors ordered similar contrivances to be attached to all locomotives, and from that day to this the voice of the locomotive has never been silent.

We Progress.

Speaking the other day of the mysterious cathode, or "X" rays, F. E. Davenport called attention to the accidental discovery, when Roentgen happened to receive the light in such a way as to show the bones of his hand. The picture was a little obscure, but Mr. Davenport says it was as well defined as some of the earlier photographs, or rather daguerreotypes. He remembers a daguerreotype of a lady, taken when the art was new in which she had to sit three hours and then the picture was but little plainer than the first, accidental picture of the hand under the "X" rays. Think of sitting three hours when we now take "snap shots" with a Kodak.

Wool Trade.

The Year 1895, shows a great Increase in this Branch of Industry

The American Wool and Cotton Reporter, the leading paper of that industry in the country, says of the year 1895:

In the volume of sales it has broken all previous records. The amount of foreign and domestic wool disposed of in the three principal markets up to December 12, 1895, amounted to 347,060,105 pounds, as compared with 261,067,229 pounds December 15, 1892. It will be also memorable for an unprecedented development of the worsted industry and for the lead which combed yarn fabrics have held in the woolen dry goods trade, notably in cloths for men's wear. And finally, it has seen some tardy recovery in values of the staple from the depression of two years ago.

Some idea of the recovery in values of domestic wool during the year may be obtained by a comparison of prices December 21, 1895, with rates January 1. At the earlier date, Ohio XX and above was quoted at 17 cents to 18 cents; at the later, 19 cents to 20 cents., and XXX selling at 21 cents; Ohio and Michigan X, in January, 15 to 17 cents., in December, 16 to 18 cents; No. 1 wools, at the commencement of the year, 18 to 20 cents; at the close, 20 to 22 cents; ½ and ⅜ unwashed combing, 15 to 16 cents in January; 16 to 18 cents in December; ⅜ and ¼ blood combing, 16 to 17 cents early in the year; 17 to 19 cents at the close. Fine medium Wyoming and Utah, in January, 10 to 12 cents; in December 12 to 13 cents; Eastern Oregon, in January, 11½ to 12 cents; in December, 12 to 13½ cents. Stocks of domestic wool December 21, 1895, in the three principal markets amount in toto to 53,726,588.

Stocks of foreign wool at the same points aggregate 27,241,200 pounds.

The total supply of domestic wool in all the markets of the country, together with unreported lots, will amount to 101,726,238 pounds, which, combined with the quantity of foreign wool in the three great seaboard markets, will make the grand total (about) 128,967,438 pounds.—American Wool and Cotton Reporter.

Township Trustee's Report

Attorney-General Ketchman submits the following opinion: "The law requires township trustees to post publish statements of their indebtedness in detail, giving number and total of outstanding orders, warrants and accounts applies to the trustees now in office, and said report should be published by said trustees on the first Monday in August, or as near that date as a weekly paper in general circulation in his county can be had. I think a publication in the next issue during that week would be sufficient. The statue says explictly that the trustees shall cause a copy of his report in full to be published and that does not mean simply a statement of the receipts and expenditures of each fund, but that he shall publish a statement showing his indebtedness in detail, giving the numbers and total amount of the outstanding orders, warrants and accounts chargeable to such funds, which shall be sworn to."

Trustees report on three funds in March and two in August, but the publication on all funds should be made in August according to the above opinion.

School Enumeration

The first euumeration under the new law of persons of of school age in the state will be taken between April 10 and 30. The enumerator takes an oath that he will make an accurate enumeration, and this oath becomes a part of record in the office of township trustee.

The enumerator is required to list the names of parents, guardians, heads of families or persons having charge of the child or children The full name age and sex of the child must be listed, and the parent or guardian is required to sign the certificate after it has been filled out, and set out the place of residence, including the street and number in the city.

His Song.

The following good story of the late Mr. English is found in some old-time anecdotes in the Albion New Era:

The death of Wm. H. English—once the democratic nominee for vice-president with General Hancock at the head of the national ticket,—suggests the following incident which was related by "Roxy Jane," himself being the guest of the distinguished nominee. "Roxy" (Caleb H. Skeels) once lived in southern Indiana, where he married his first wife, by whom he became, except the first named, the father of three daughters singularly named Florida, Georgia and Louisana. He was on a canvassing tour in the interests of a map publishing campany, and visited Indianapolis. Roxy was a good talker and his map speech was a pretty, musical one and usually was a winning card. He called at Mr. English's office, and, with a polite bow unrolled his map and began his persuasive speech. The listener apparently became more and more interested as Roxy proceeded; which mark of attention led the young canvasser to hope that he was drawing his auditor closer and tighter into his wily meshes. Mr. English did not interrupt Roxy until he finished the finely worded poetic language; and then it was that the speech-maker received the severest blow to his genius that had ever befallen him. The great statesman and politician arose from his desk, and himself addressed the visitor: "My good sir, I do not want your map, but I should very much like to buy that song you sing so sweetly!"

There was a case in 'Squire Walborn's court Thursday afternoon. It was from Garrett, the trouble being a neighborhood quarrel between two women. It came before his honor in the form of a case of provoke, and they had to call in a jury of twelve good men and true, who after due consideration and hearing witnesses gave the complainant one cent damages. So she will have to pay costs, say about $30. She had caused a quarrel by telling that a neighbor woman, both being Catholics, had kept away from church at a given date under excuse of being sick, when she really wanted to avoid contributing to the church funds. This was brought to the ears of the lady complained of, as well as to Father Young. The latter tried to keep peace between them, but in vain. The quarrel grew hot till there was a cause of "provoke." Myers and Mounts were attorneys for the defense, while Emanuel, of Auburn and Stoner, of Garrett, were for the plaintiff. The attorneys for defense, are now asking for a new trial.

What is

CASTORIA

Castoria is Dr. Samuel Pitcher's prescription for Infants and Children. It contains neither Opium, Morphine nor other Narcotic substance. It is a harmless substitute for Paregoric, Drops, Soothing Syrups, and Castor Oil. It is Pleasant. Its guarantee is thirty years' use by Millions of Mothers. Castoria destroys Worms and allays feverishness. Castoria prevents vomiting Sour Curd, cures Diarrhœa and Wind Colic. Castoria relieves teething troubles, cures constipation and flatulency. Castoria assimilates the food, regulates the stomach and bowels, giving healthy and natural sleep. Castoria is the Children's Panacea—the Mother's Friend.

Castoria.

"Castoria is an excellent medicine for children. Mothers have repeatedly told me of its good effect upon their children."
DR. G. C. OSGOOD, Lowell, Mass.

"Castoria is the best remedy for children of which I am acquainted. I hope the day is not far distant when mothers will consider the real interest of their children, and use Castoria instead of the various quack nostrums which are destroying their loved ones, by forcing opium, morphine, soothing syrup and other hurtful agents down their throats, thereby sending them to premature graves."
DR. J. F. KINCHELOE, Conway, Ark.

Castoria.

"Castoria is so well adapted to children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me."
H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 111 So. Oxford St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

"Our physicians in the children's department have spoken highly of their experience in their outside practice with Castoria, and although we only have among our medical supplies what is known as regular products, yet we are free to confess that the merits of Castoria has won us to look with favor upon it."

Father was on the Engine When It Killed His Son.

A special from Alliance, Ohio, says: Frank Hirst, aged 17 years, a son of John Hirst, an engineer on the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad, residing at Bayard, near here, attempted to climb on his father's engine while the engine was slowly backing on a side track at this place. The lad's hands slipped from the hand-hold, and he fell under the engine. Before the horrified father could bring the engine to a standstill the wheels passed over the boy, severing his head from the body. The father is crazed with grief, and has required the constant attendance of physicians since.

Torn into Shreds.

Lilrid Bacon, one of the most prominent citizens of Roane County, Tenn., killed himself in a terrible manner, near Kingston. He took a stick of dynamite and fuse into the front yard of his residence, lit the fuse, laid down upon the deadly explosive and waited for it to blow his body to atoms. His wish was soon gratified. The dynamite exploded with such force that his body was torn into shreds and scattered for many feet around. Brooding over having been arrested for perjury is assigned as the cause of Bacon's rash act.

Bandit King Sentenced.

Pere J. Passarelle, the Italian bandit king and leader of the Mafia in this country, was sentenced at Wilkesbarre, Penn., to five years in the penitentiary. There are fourteen other indictments against him. He was convicted of attempt to rob an old man. For years he was a terror to people of Hazleton regions. After committing many crimes he fled to Chicago where he was arrested. Judge Woodward scored him unmercifully, and said there was no room in this country for the Mafia.

A Convict's Terrible Fate.

In trying to put a belt on a moving pulley wheel in the chair factory at the penitentiary at Frankfort, Ky., Jacob McPeak, a Pike County convict, was caught and whirled around the shaft. His right leg was crushed and broken, one arm mangled, face and head cut and bruised almost beyond recognition, and every vestige of clothing was stripped from his body. Strange to say, he is still alive, but cannot recover. His term would have expired in a few weeks.

Chinese Blown Up.

San Francisco special: Three hundred Chinese were blown to atoms by the explosion of a magazine attached to the fort at Kiang, in China, on February 24. The disaster, according to the mail advices received by steamer, was the work of mutinous soldiers, who were preparing to join secret society rebels in the attack on the adjacent town, but whether through carelessness or by intention is not known.

Fired On by Spaniards.

A special from Kingston, Jamaica, says: The schooner William Todd, Capt. Campbell, belonging to Calais, has arrived here from Mobile, Ala. Her commander reports that he was fired on by Spanish gunboats off the Isle of Pines. He "hove to," was boarded and his vessel was searched. The Spaniards did not find anything contraband on board the schooner, and so she was allowed to proceed.

A Collision.

An electric street car collided with an omnibus filled with people at Leavitt and Lake streets, Chicago, and the vehicle was totally destroyed. Samuel Williams, one of the passengers in the omnibus, was terribly bruised and suffered a dislocation of his right shoulder. F. W. Peterson, motorman, was badly cut about the head by broken glass. A dozen others were slightly injured.

Bound and Robbed.

Masked thieves entered the house of N. L. Surdam, aged 90 years, who lives near Pawpaw, Mich., and, after binding and gagging him and his son, ransacked the house, securing $2,400. The thieves left their victims helpless, in which condition they were found next morning by neighbors. Surdam was robbed several years ago in a similar manner. The robbers left no clew.

Woman Killed on the Lake Shore Road.

A special from Sandusky, Ohio, says: Mrs. Ferdinand Siegel was instantly killed, and her son, aged 16, fatally injured by a Lake Shore express crashing into a buggy in which they were seated. Young Siegel died a few hours afterward of his injuries. The flagman of the crossing is charged with neglect of duty.

Suffocated in a Car of Oats.

Train No. 11 on the Indiana, Illinois and Iowa Railroad, east bound, loaded with grain and dressed beef, was wrecked near Toto, Ind. The Pan-handle wrecking train in clearing up the track found the dead bodies of four unknown men in a car of oats. They had evidently died of suffocation. None of the bodies were identified.

Running Circuit Abandoned.

The proposed running circuit which was to include Toledo, Indianapolis, Terre Haute, Elkhart, Saginaw, and Windsor, Canada, has been abandoned. Only the first named three cities were prepared to enter the circuit and with them alone it was not possible to make the thing pay.

Opera House Burned.

The Grand Opera house, one of the finest theatres in the west, burned at Springfield, Mo. The fire originated under the stage and swept through the scenery, and in a few minutes the entire building was in flames. The loss is about $80,000, with insurance of $40,000.

Suspicious Death.

Ellis Peters, 13 years old, was found dead in bed at his home in Arcadia, Ohio. Circumstances indicate poisoning, and the case is being investigated by the authorities.

Killed Her Keeper.

Chicago special: A crazed elephant killed her keeper and escaped from her quarters, and charged up and down the streets and alleys of the west side recently. The animal was the elephant Gypsy, attached to a traveling circus and Frank Scott whom she killed had had charge of her for a number of years. After killing Scott, Gypsy strolled from the barn to Jackson Boulevard and back again. Twenty policemen were called from West Lake street station and a dozen from the Warren avenue station, and ten park policemen under Captain Pateuk. No one dared to tackle the brute. The animal was finally quieted by elephant trainers from the city parks.

A STARTLING FIND.

Corpse Purchased at an Auction Sale of Express Matter.

The badly decomposed body of an unknown man was found recently in a trunk bought at an auction in Wakem & McLaughlin's warehouse, at 504 North Water street, Chicago. The auction was the regular disposal of unredeemed property. The sale was almost over when a large, rough box was dragged out and offered. Bids were made and the box knocked down to two men from the suburb of Austin, Philip Grief and Charles Haas. Inside was a square trunk, which was broken open. The trunk contained the badly decomposed body of a man, without any clew of identification. On top was written "G. M. Morgan, 166 Jefferson Court, Chicago." Nothing else was found to establish former ownership. J. Wallace Waken, the senior member of the warehouse firm, said: "I think this box was sent to us by the Michigan Central Railroad company. They sent us a lot of baggage a year ago and the box, if I remember correctly, was included." The undertaker, who took charge of the body, said that some material intended to hasten decomposition had been thrown upon the body when is was placed in the box.

TRADE REVIEW.

No Important Change in the General Condition of Business.

R. G. Dun & Co.'s Weekly Review of Trade says: "No important change has occurred in the general condition of business during the passed week, and if trade, in some respects, looks worse, in other respects it seems better. Some failures of magnitude have occurred, which have caused much apprehension and unwillingness to lend among bankers, and there have been somewhat less favorable features in the dry goods market; but in iron and steel, conditions are slightly improved, and in boots and shoes considerably more hopeful. Foreign trade is a little more satisfactory, exports from New York for three weeks showing an increase over last year of 6 per cent., while imports have shown nearly the same rate of decrease. In general the course of domestic prices tends to favor the marketing of staples abroad. Wheat has gained about a point but corn and cotton remain unchanged.

Outbreak at Killiz.

Constantinople special: The outbreak at Killiz is more serious than had been supposed. The town is now surrounded by troops and no one is allowed to leave or enter the place. The officials from Bitlis are preventing the American missionaries from distributing aid. The British Ambassador, Sir Phillip Currie, has had an interview with Tewfik Pasha, the Minister for Forei Affairs, on the subject.

Massacred the Whites.

Cape Town special: The Matabeless of the Inseza and Filabusi Districts has revolted and massacred the white settlers, including Commissary Bentley. The fugitive whites are flocking to Buluawayo and Gwelo for protection. A detachment of 75 volunteers, with a Maxim gun, have been dispatched against the natives.

Taggart Not a Candidate.

A special dispatch from Indianapolis says: Mayor Thomas Taggart said to a correspondent recently that he will not be a candidate for Governor of Indiana on the Democratic ticket, and in a few days he will make his intentions known to the Democratic party.

Crushed By a Fall.

John Hinson, aged 15, fell down the precipice thirty miles south of Clarksville, Tenn., breaking his neck and mangling his limbs and body. He is the son of a wealthy planter, who removed to one of his plantations some time since from Clarksville.

Hoosier Editors Feast.

The Southern Indiana Press Association held their semi-annual session at Columbus, with a good attendance. Several papers were read and a public reception was held at the City Hall. The visitors were banquetted at the Hotel Belvidere.

Three Mangled Bodies.

The dead bodies of three boys, aged 18, 15 and 11 years, named Boone Smith, Tom Shiflet and Charles McMillan respectively, were found on the railroad track two miles south of Brownsboro, Texas, supposed to have been killed by a train.

Sixty-five Miners Entombed.

An explosion occurred in the Brunner mine at Wellington, New Zealand. Five miners are known to have been killed and sixty-five are entombed with no hope of their being rescued.

One was Killed.

A wheel broke and wrecked a train at Shelby, Ind. About twelve cars were wrecked and piled up together, and an unknown man killed and mangled beyond recognition.

DUNKARDS IN EXODUS

TWENTY COLONIES GO FROM THE EAST TO THE WEST.

Members Are from Six Different States and They Pass Through Chicago on Their Way to Dakota—Britain to Recognize Cubans.

Seek New Homes.

Twenty colonies of Dunkards from six different States passed through Chicago on their way to new homes in North Dakota. The colonists, numbered 1,500, and they expect to settle along the line of the Great Northern Railroad in North Dakota.

The Dunkards arrived over the Baltimore and Ohio, Wabash, Nickel Plate, Pan-Handle and Monon roads. They are from colonies in half a hundred towns in Virginia, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. The special trains were slow in arriving. As fast as sufficient cars were on hand a new train was made up in the Wisconsin Central yards and started for the Northwest. In order to carry all the emigrants four trains were necessary. The composition of these trains was twenty passenger coaches and 102 freight cars.

In the freight cars were families moving their household goods, farm implements and live stock. In the coaches were families having sold out most of their goods, thinking it cheaper to pay cash for what will be needed in their new homes than to pay freight rates on the old. A number of women used the coaches while their husbands and elder sons looked after the goods in the freight cars.

Their Second Exodus.

The present is the second exodus of Dunkards from the East to North Dakota in the last three years. They come from old-established colonies which have been sending out members to the West for half a century. Often children grow up, have families of their own, and leave the parent colony much after the nature of bees, which swarm when their quarters become too crowded. Such is the case in this instance. The fathers of large families have left their Eastern homes, where land is high, with a view to establishing large family estates in the West. These emigrants are not of the poorer class. Many are well-to-do and all are industrious, desirable citizens.

For some time the elders of the church have been investigating the desirability for settlement on North Dakota lands. The reports have been favorable and the present emigration is the result. The fate of the present colonists will decide the future action of several times as many who have staid at home and are watching the venture with a view to following should it prove successful.

The one great object of the movement is the desire to possess more land. In the country where they are going there remains a large tract of Government land open to settlement. This was not ready for such purposes until recently, when the Great Northern pushed its road through what is known as the Devil's Lake country. Within a few years many small towns have sprung up along the line and the country is rapidly being broken up into farms.

Each head of a Dunkard family will homestead on 160 acres of land. His sons and sons-in-law over 21 years old will take a like amount. In this way families will absorb entire sections of land. Each family will also be a nucleus around which other Dunkards will settle. In a few generations the big farms will be divided and subdivided among the children, until finally no more land will remain and another exodus will be necessary.

A MORTON RALLY.

Enthusiastic Gathering of Republicans in the Empire State.

Messrs. Depew, Miller, Platt and Lauterbach will be the four delegates-at-large to St. Louis from New York State, and they are instructed for Gov. Morton. The blot upon the indorsement which New York gave to Gov. Morton consist of 109 votes out of a total of 740, against the election of Messrs. Platt and Lauterbach as delegates-at-large to St. Louis. A correspondent says: In reality this vote was a protest against the leadership of Mr. Platt rather than a protest against the candidacy of Gov. Morton, and in the convention those who at heart favored Major McKinley as second choice numbered at least 400.

LEVI P. MORTON.

In the platform no mention is made of State issues, and the expected fight over the Raines excise tax law did not therefore materialize. The resolutions declare for a protective tariff, are unequivocally for a gold standard and against the free coinage of silver, and present Gov. Morton to the Republicans of the nation as New York's choice for the presidency, lauding his public service, praising his ability, and declaring that notwithstanding his age he is still in the prime of his vigor.

BRITAIN TO AID CUBA.

To Follow America in Recognizing the Patriots.

Aid for Cuba has come from an unexpected source. John Bull will pat Uncle Sam on the shoulder in any proposition to intervene to stop the butchery on the island. An informal intimation to this effect has been received at the State Department and the status of the Cuban question has changed at once owing to this sudden development.

While Spain has been preparing for an appeal to European nations against the United States, Great Britain has quietly taken the other tack, and decided to join with the United States in helping the Cuban patriots. Naturally, such a communication was not conveyed in an official letter, but Secretary Olney was given to understand by Sir Julian Pauncefote that Great Britain would not only not object to any action the United States might take in regard to Cuba, but would even welcome any reasonable interference which would tend to stop the butchery now going on in the island.

That such an intimation was given semi-officially was learned positively, and the effect of the information when it becomes generally known will be to render almost certain speedy action by this country. Dispatches from Spain within the last few days are authority for the statement that a definite policy has been agreed upon there. Spain proposed to pose as the champion of European nations holding possessions in America against the arrogance of the Yankees. The European nations were to be sounded in order to secure concert of action, and then Spain was to tell President Cleveland to go ahead if he dared in the face of a formidable alliance which would prevent active intervention by force if necessary.

This plan has been blocked completely by the action of Great Britain, and President Cleveland's hands have been strengthened immeasurably by Lord Salisbury's government. Great Britain deplores the inhuman Spanish warfare on the island, and English commercial interests could not look on unmoved while the price of sugar was moving upward as the result of the destruction of Cuban canefields. Therefore came the informal intimation that Great Britain would gladly stand aside and see the United States take the initiative in Cuba. No promises were made that could bind Great Britain in any way, and the Queen's government was not put on record in any way, but Secretary Olney has been given to understand that if the President decides to recognize the patriots as belligerents Great Britain will not be far behind in doing the same thing.

MILLS IS FOR WAR.

Texas Senator Says the United States' Duty Is to Free Cuba.

Senator Mills spoke Tuesday in defense of the Cuban resolution introduced by him. He said the resolutions heretofore before the Senate were steps in the right direction, but very short steps. The people of Cuba had far greater claims on the United States than mere recognition of belligerency. If Ireland struck for liberty to-day the hearts of the American people would beat in sympathy, and so if Poland or Hungary asserted the right of liberty. But the United States had much closer relations to Cuba than to Ireland or Poland or Hungary, for it was part of the Western Hemisphere over which the SENATOR MILLS.

Monroe doctrine extended the influence of this country. Mr. Mills declared that the Monroe doctrine was a law of protection and that as such God was the author of it. It was the same right of self-protection which an individual exercises in abating a nuisance or destroying a powder house near his premises.

Jefferson had used plain words in threatening to join England and sweep the French fleets from the seas if France persisted in holding the mouth of the Mississippi river. The same spirit had brought forth President Cleveland's Venezuela message. Cuba stood as the key to the gulf, and our unvarying policy, said Mr. Mills, has been to resist any transfer of Cuba to another monarchy. The United States has stood by as a jailer and prevented Cuba from going to France or England. And, if we insisted on keeping Cuba in the possession of Spain, was it not the moral obligation of the United States to see that Spain gave Cuba fair government, to see that the hell of all hellish despotism was lifted from the Cuban people?

"The day will come," said Mr. Mills, "when the American conscience will be aroused to its guilt in permitting the oppression of Cuba, and when that consciousness comes the American people will fill this chamber with Senators who will stop that oppression."

The Senator read of atrocities attributed to Gen. Weyler and added: "This is the work of that atrocious scoundrel. He could not be in Cuba to-day if the United States would draw her sword. How the cheeks of our American women must be suffused, how our children must blush to know that this government stands idly by while Spain, with the keys of her dungeons dangling at her side, permits such an atrocious villain to raise his hand against defenseless women."

HIGH THEATER HAT BILL PASSED

Ohio Legislators Have Fun with the Measure.

The Fosdick bill to prohibit the wearing of high hats by women in theaters was passed in the Ohio House. The bill nearly passed two weeks ago, under suspension of the rules, but was prevented from going through with a whirl by Mr. Stewart's amendments adding six months' imprisonment to the penalty of a fine. Mr. Stewart withdrew this amendment.

Mr. Bosler thought the women ought not to be fined for wearing the hats, but that the managers of theaters who permitted his patrons to wear such obstructions should be fined, and, moreover, then there would be some way of enforcing the law. He accordingly offered an amendment making that change, fining the manager of an opera house or theater $10 for permitting a person to wear an obstruction in the shape of a hat or headgear, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Stewart of Clarke made an exceedingly serious argument against the bill. He thought the bill ought to be fixed to give women protection against men who go out between acts, to the great annoyance of the women. Mr. Stewart proposed to amend the bill, making it a misdemeanor for men to go out between the acts for drinks; also a chief inspector of hats, he to appoint deputies in all cities. They would seize all the hats worn in violation of the law. These amendments were disagreed to. Fosdick said his bill was a temperance measure, as high hats drive men to drink between acts.

BOOST FOR M'KINLEY.

Eighteen More Votes Go Into the Ohio Column.

Just before the Minnesota State Republican convention was called to order it was announced that Senator Davis had wired Congressman Tawney withdrawing from the presidential race. This action was due to the refusal of three of five Minnesota district conventions to indorse his candidacy. Before an adjournment the following resolutions were adopted by a rising vote:

C. K. DAVIS.

"Resolved, That the well considered and pronounced preference of the Republicans of Minnesota for presidential standard bearer in 1896 is William McKinley, and this convention expects the delegates and alternates-at-large to-day to be elected by it to do all in their power honorably from now until that object is accomplished to bring about promptly the nomination of William McKinley for President of the United States."

Telegraphic Brevities.

Col. Thomas P. Ochiltree is seriously ill at his home in New York. His valet says he is unable to see anyone and his physician has ordered absolute quiet.

Capt. W. H. Bradbury, deputy warden of the Missouri penitentiary for thirty-six years, is dead, aged 75. He had a remarkable record for personal courage.

FAT IS NOW FRYING.

SENATOR CHANDLER REPEATS HIS CHARGE.

In a Letter to a Washington Paper He Asserts that Money Is Being Collected by McKinley's Managers—Unjust to the Other Candidates.

Explains the "Fat Frying."

When rogues fall out they are apt to tell the truth about each other. The Republican rascals who are laying plans to capture the Government so that they can again enact high tariff laws in the interest of trusts and monopolies are just now quarreling among themselves over the nomination for President. Major McKinley is so far in the lead of all the other candidates that the friends of the latter have become angry and boldly assert that the Ohio man's friends are using large sums of money to buy the delegates to the national convention. Among other eminent Republicans who charge McKinley's friends with making a boodle campaign for the nomination is Senator Chandler, of New Hampshire, who says:

"I was very cautious in speaking about McKinley, but it certainly does seem to me that he is in the hands of unscrupulous managers. They say that this year the Republicans can elect a yellow dog if we nominated one. At the same time look at the situation. If McKinley is nominated we shall have to meet the charge that we fried the fat out of the manufacturers in the last campaign, that he fried the fat out of them again to secure his nomination, that he is continuing to fry the fat to buy his election, and as a result he will pay his political debts with a high-tariff framed solely in the interests of the manufacturers.

"With such charges as these to meet on the stump, the campaign on the part of the Republicans will be defensive instead of offensive."

In a letter addressed to the editor of a Washington paper Senator Chandler explains some of the statements he made in the interview concerning McKinley's canvass. Mr. Chandler declares he did not intend to cast any slur upon McKinley personally, but beyond that the Senator does not retract a word of his statement. In fact, he reiterates it with an attention to the circumstantial details of the fat-fryers' work which was lacking in the original interview. The latter is as follows:

The interview with me on March 16 has led to much misrepresentation of its terms. I said nothing unkind of Mr. McKinley personally, but called attention to certain methods of some of his managers and protested against their adoption. The substance of the charge made by me was that the same men who had assisted in raising the money to pay Mr. McKinley's debts were calling upon the owners of protected industries to make contributions to help nominate him for President.

Although the charge has been denied by Gen. Grosvenor and others, a review of the subject confirms my conviction that it is true. As bearing upon the question whether the collection and the use of the funds are for reasonable and legitimate expenditures I add that the fund which it was planned to raise was to be $250,000, a sum which could not be needed except for illegitimate purposes. In view of the effort to raise this large fund from protected interests my points were very simple and clear.

Such a movement is unfair and unjust toward the other candidates, in whose behalf it is certain no such large sums of money are being raised or used. Messrs. Reed, Morton, Quay, Cullom, Allison, Davis and Manderson are as devoted friends of protection as Mr. McKinley is, and the triumph of any one of them would be as sure a guaranty of the enactment of judicious and effective tariff laws as would be the victory of Mr. McKinley. For manufacturers to contribute large sums of money to be expended in nominating Mr. McKinley over any other candidate hitherto named would be a most unjust and uncalled-for proceeding.

The interests of the Republican party will be seriously injured by demanding and receiving such large contributions from the representatives of protected interests. It has been a continuous cause of attack by the opponents of protection—the belief that the system has been maintained, Republican victories achieved and particular tariff schedules secured from Congress by the money of manufacturers. Whatever may be said in justification of reasonable contributions from such interests toward the expenses of presidential and congressional elections after the nominations are made, a system of using money to control Republican nominations for office would be scandalous in the highest degree and fatal to all attempts to maintain the purity and honesty of the party organization.

If to the natural popularity and strength of Mr. McKinley Messrs. Osborne and Hanna are to continue to add the expenditure in improper ways of large sums of money collected by them from the owners of industries protected by the tariff, thoughtful Republicans will do well to consider the consequences of a nomination thus made; the character of the canvass which is to ensue, the possible defeat which, even with the bright prospects before us, may come if we rush headlong into any egregious blunder, and the controversies which, even if we are successful, are to follow such an admission of the standing charge of our opponents, that gross venality and corruption attend the maintenance of a high tariff system by the Republican party, which charge we have hitherto truthfully denied.

The Republican party is about to be returned, if it acts wisely, to overwhelming political power in this country. The party should begin its new career sustained by high principles and free from corrupt practices. It will be a fatal mistake, soon to be grievously punished, if we make a dishonest start. W. E. CHANDLER.

When a Republican Senator admits that the candidate of his party will be forced to answer charges that he bought his nomination with "fat" tried out of protected interests, to be repaid with high tariff favors, it should be easy for the Democrats to win on a platform of principles versus corruption funds.

A High Tariff Clown.

Congressman J. P. Dolliver of Iowa is ambitious to wrest from ex-Congressman Roswell G. Horr of Michigan the distinction of being the biggest buffoon on the high tariff stump. In the Iowa Republican State convention he repeated some of his stale Congressional jokes, which the assembled Republicans were polite enough to laugh at. Then ceasing to jest he proceeded to record his "most solemn conviction that the only way out of the present condition of misfortune was to give back to the workingman of the United States the opportunity to do all the work of the American people." This time his hearers did not laugh. They were probably too much depressed at the terrible thought that through the designs of the bold, bad Mr. Wilson and his Democratic associates, the American hired man was having his work done for him by some obliging foreigner. The condition of misfortune which had followed the repeal of the McKinley law, owing to the willingness of other people to do all our work, had probably never before been realized. But when Dolliver, orator, wit and statesman, unlimbered his jaw and told how the American people were suffering because they did not have to work so hard as when they had more taxes to pay, it all became as clear as mud. The Iowa Republicans looked at each other and whispered, "Ain't he great?"

And he is great. A man who can look over this broad land and see armies of workingmen who are idle because foreigners are willing to give us goods for nothing, and understand at once that the way to change things is to allow the American people to do their own work, must be a genius. Of course there will be some carping critics who will say that as long as they get things made abroad without paying for them, the American people would be foolish to want to work. And the same critics will say that as a matter of fact our workingmen are even now busy in the mines, mills, or on the farms, producing things to send abroad in exchange for what we import. But Dolliver knows better. He knows that since the Wilson law went in force all our work, including that of building houses, digging wells and inventing protection arguments, has been done by European labor. If the Iowa farmers have not noticed that their ploughing has been done by foreign paupers, it is probably because they have not been observant. If they think that it would be a mighty good thing if somebody would do their work for them, they are mistaken. They should do all their own work, except thinking on the tariff question. Dolliver will do that for them.

It is well to know just what to expect in case the Republicans are returned to power this year. So long as there was a likelihood that the American people would continue to have their washing and other work done abroad, it was useless to look forward to a return to the happy conditions which prevailed in 1893. But when it becomes certain that the workingmen of the United States will be allowed to do all the work of the American people, such as growing tea and coffee, or gathering elephants' tusks, then the prosperity of the McKinley panic years will be assured.—Exchange.

Our Best Customer.

The bureau of statistics on the commerce and navigation of the United States has just issued an annual report which contains some instructive figures. Of our entire exports the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland purchased just 47.94 per cent; Germany a little over 10 per cent.; France something over 5 per cent., the Netherlands 4 per cent., the whole of South America a little over 4 per cent. In the matter of imports one-fifth of what we purchase comes from the United Kingdom; Germany takes about the same quantity from us that we take from her, while as between France and this country the balance of trade is in favor of France.

Thus it will be seen that free trade England takes from us nearly half of our exports and we take from her just one-fifth of our imports. Protection countries like Germany and France consume very little over in the one instance one-tenth and in the other instance one-fifth of what we sell. The reason that our exports to these countries are so small is to be found in the fact that they have placed a duty on American goods. While the working men of Paris were starving a short time ago, meat was prohibited from the shores of this nation by prohibitive duty. The Agrarian party in Germany succeeded in having a tax put upon American corn.

If the importation of English products were as free as the exportation of our products is to England, then there is little doubt that our export trade to that country would show a marked increase. The figures quoted should cause the protectionist, not less than the jingoist, to pause.—St. Louis Republic

Do They Know What Is Good for Them?

The theory of protection rests on the supposition that if the people were not restrained by tariff laws they would buy things to their disadvantage. Acting on this idea, the high-tariffites proceed to prohibit trade which private individuals find profitable, and justify their action by the pretense that unless they were "protected" the consumers would be fooled by the sellers of cheap foreign products.

If it were true that the people could not be trusted to look out for their own interests when buying goods, it would still remain to be proved that a protectionist Congress would be any wiser. If the majority are fools in business matters which directly concern themselves, how can they elect all-wise representatives and what reason is there for believing that a few hundred politicians know more about the value and quality of goods than the practical business men who handle them?

Any one who believes that the people are capable of self-government must acknowledge that they know enough to buy and sell to their best advantage. Any other view is suited only to a despotism or paternalism in which the few rule the many.

THE WEEK'S DOINGS IN SENATE AND HOUSE.

A Comprehensive Digest of the Proceedings in the Legislative Chambers at Washington—Matters that Concern the People.

Lawmakers at Labor.

An unexpected climax to the Cuban debate was reached in the Senate Monday when, on motion of Mr. Sherman, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Cuban resolutions were recommitted to the conference committee. The vote to recommit was unanimous and without the formality of a roll call, representing a general consensus of opinion that the committee should so change the resolutions as to overcome the opposition that has developed. Messrs. Sherman, Morgan and Lodge were appointed to represent the Senate in a further conference. Simultaneously with this action Mr. Mills presented Cuban resolutions which propose to go farther than has yet been suggested. They direct the President to request Spain to grant local self-government to Cuba, and in case Spain refuses the President is authorized to use the military and naval forces in taking possession of Cuba and holding it until self-government is established by the Cuban people. The House Committee on Elections of President and Vice-President reported favorably the bill introduced by Mr. Corliss, of Michigan, providing for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people. Some amendments of minor importance were adopted.

The question of reforming the fee system of the United States District Attorneys and Marshals occasioned much debate in the Senate Wednesday. Mr. Hoar opposed the change from fees to salaries by means of an appropriation bill, as it was a large subject, needing separate treatment. Mr. Allen (Pop.) of Nebraska attacked the high salaries. He declared that the offices of District Attorney were given frequently in payment of political debts, and instead of requiring a high degree of legal talent the places sometimes went to "shysters" who could not earn a living out of office. Mr. George (Dem.) of Mississippi attacked the entire policy of giving high salaries and showed that the Governors and Attorney Generals of States received less by half than the bill proposed allowing Federal District Attorneys. Mr. Allen also criticised the provision allowing the Attorney General to designate the number of Deputy Marshals. He spoke against the "horde of officeholders." Under Buchanan the Government spent $50,000,000 annually and now it is $500,000,000. In that time the population had doubled, but the expenses had increased tenfold. Officers were thrusting their hands into the treasury and by hook and crook, mainly by crook, seeking to increase their salaries. The purpose of this provision was to add to the offices controlled by an executive officer. Mr. Hoar responded warmly that the Senate could not waste its time investigating the details of the number of Deputy Marshals in each of the seventy-seven districts in the United States. If it did it would become a laughing stock. If the Government could not trust the Attorney General with this duty then the American Government had better shut up shop and apply to some Populist club to carry on its affairs. After an extended debate the salaries for District Attorneys and Marshals were agreed to as reported, with a few minor changes. The legislative appropriation was not completed when at 5:30 the Senate went into executive session and soon after adjourned. The House discussed naval appropriation.

The Senate spent most of Thursday on the legislative appropriation bill, but did not complete owing to Mr. Sherman's motion to strike out the proposition for the change from fees to salaries for United States district attorneys and marshals. A joint resolution was adopted allowing ex-President Harrison to accept decorations from Brazil and Spain. The joint resolution was passed providing for the appointment of a commission under the direction of the Secretary of War for the preliminary survey, with plans, specifications and approximate estimates of cost thereof, for the construction of a ship canal of approved width and depth, from the lower shore of Lake Michigan to the Wabash river, and for the further investigation of the practicability of the construction of such waterway. The naval appropriation bill was passed by the House without substantial amendment. The bill carries $31,611,034 and authorizes the construction of four battle ships and fifteen torpedo boats, the total cost of which will be in the neighborhood of $35,000,000.

The Senate indulged in an acrimonious political debate Friday. The controversy arose over Mr. Hill's motion to strike from the legislative appropriation bill the proposed change of the date of assembling the New Mexico Legislature from December to May. Mr. Hill bitterly denounced the change as a political trick. Mr. Elkins protested. The debate took a wide range, Senators Gorman, Faulkner, Cockrell and other Democrats attacking the provision as political, while Senators Elkins, Carter, Cullom and other Republican Senators defended it. Mr. Cullom sought to table Mr. Hill's motion, but a motion to this effect failed by a vote of 21 to 29, whereupon Mr. Cullom yielded to the Hill motion and the New Mexico provision was struck out. The Senate passed the legislative appropriation bill, carrying $21,500,000. Aside from providing the usual appropriations, the bill is important in effecting a reform of the system of compensation for United States District Attorneys and Marshals, salaries being substituted for fees. The appropriation committee attempted to take up the sundry civil appropriation bill in the House, but the members who were interested in bills on the private calendar defeated them by a vote of 142 to 77.

Emperor William's Bumps.

An English phrenologist who has examined the head of Emperor William II., says that there is nothing unusual about it. "It is," he says, "a medium head, of the military type, such as can be found by the score in the army. The bumps of self-love and combativeness are abnormally developed. He will never let himself be stopped by an obstacle. There is no power on earth that could exercise the least pressure upon him. His self-love is so great that it would not surprise me if he should proclaim himself infallible. He would be perfectly sincere in so doing."

AT HER MERCY

BY HARRIET JAY.

CHAPTER I.

I, Sir John Priestly, Knight and M. D., of Berkeley street, Mayfair, have been asked by one of the most charming of my patients to extract from my diary portions which refer to a mysterious drama which took place in 1872, and in which I played a small but important part. I have no hesitation in granting my fair patient's request, paraphrasing rather than merely transcribing the contents of my note book.

"Beg pardon, sir; where to?"

"Where to? Oh, anywhere—the first station you come to! No, to St. Pancras," I replied, and was about to step into the hansom, upon which my traveling bag had been deposited, when a detaining hand was laid heavily upon my shoulder.

I turned, and faced a man, tall, swarthy, sinewy built, and elegantly dressed. His eyes were fixed with a curious expression upon my face.

"Dr. Priestly, I believe," he said, speaking with a slight foreign accent.

I nodded.

"And you are about to start upon a journey?" he continued. "May I ask if it is of very great importance?"

"Of no importance whatever," I replied; "I was merely going away somewhere for a few days' rest and change."

"That is fortunate, since you will have less scruple in staying. I require your immediate attention for a case of urgent danger."

I looked at him more carefully, and noticed that he seemed much agitated, yet he was a man of stern cast of countenance. My hesitation seemed to trouble him, for he again put his trembling hand upon my arm.

"There is no time to lose," he said; "while we are standing here the patient may die. Pray come!"

Then, taking the management of affairs into his own hands, he ordered my man servant to remove my luggage from the cab, hurried me into another, took his seat beside me and we rattled away. The whole affair had taken place so rapidly that the cab had covered at least a mile before I began to wonder what it all meant.

The cab stopped at the top of Park lane; we alighted, and walked on. Presently we entered a side street, and stopped before a door, which my guide opened with a latch key.

We were now in comparative darkness. I could make no note whatever of the surroundings, but I followed quickly upon the footsteps of my guide, and was finally ushered into a large room furnished as a boudoir in the extreme of modern fashion. Upon a couch lay what appeared to be the lifeless body of a gentleman dressed in evening attire. By his side was a lady, also in evening dress, kneeling upon the floor, her face buried in her hands.

"Madam," said my guide, "I have brought a surgeon; will you have the great goodness to retire?"

Sobbing bitterly, the lady rose, while the gentleman led her to a door concealed by curtains of pale blue satin, and when she disappeared he returned to me.

"That is your patient, doctor," said he; "save his life, and you will be made a comparatively rich man."

I proceeded to make a careful examination. The patient was a powerfully built man of four or five and twenty, with a strikingly handsome cast of countenance. His shirt front was suffused with blood, issuing from a wound in the breast—an old flesh wound, which, after partially healing, had suddenly reopened.

"The man is in mortal danger," I said.

"But he may recover?"

"There is one way of treating the case, which would mean either life or death."

"Are you willing to try that method?"

"Well, I will undertake it."

"Good! Now, to begin with, he must be removed. If he remains in this house, not all the skill in Christendom will save his life."

The first thing to be done was to dress the wound. In the course of the operation the gentleman recovered consciousness. As his eyes rolled slowly around the room he muttered feebly:

"Constance, where are you?"

Before he could say more my companion stepped quickly to his side and whispered something in his ear. At this the sick man groaned, turned his head wearily upon the pillow, and closed his eyes.

"My dear doctor," said my guide, "while you have been working I have been thinking. I have sketched in my mind our plan of action, and it must be followed or nothing can be done. For the present, then, your work is finished. Go home and wait for your patient, who will be removed to your house."

"To my house?"

"The whole arrangement," he continued, not heeding my interruption, "must be carried out with the utmost secrecy. Not a soul must see the patient carried from here—not a soul must see him enter your doors. I will arrange for the secrecy here—you must arrange for it on your side. Oblige me by making the requisite preparations, and, for the present, good-by."

Seeing that I was dismissed, I prepared to leave the room. I was reconducted down a flight of stairs, along a dark passage, and finally was shown again into the street.

My first move was to hail a hansom and drive at once to my house, my next to inform my servants that owing to sudden and unexpected work I should not be able to pay my visit to the country.

At 11 o'clock that night everything was in readiness for the patient's reception. My servants were all in bed and sleeping soundly—all except my man Schmitz, on whom I could rely, when I was startled by the faint ringing of my door bell. I answered it, and a figure hurriedly entered. A lady, clothed from head to foot in black and heavily veiled. She was trembling violently, and her dress was saturated with the heavily falling rain.

"Sir," she said, hurriedly, "I wish to speak to you, if you are Dr. Priestly."

Without a word I led the way into my study. She quietly raised her veil. Then I saw that my visitor was a young girl, about 20 years of age. Her skin was as white as alabaster, her hair as black as jet, while her eyes, large and lustrous, were fixed upon my face with a look which went to my very soul.

"Sir," she said sweetly, "I came to look at your face. I am glad that I came. The sight of you gives me courage."

"Indeed!" I replied; "I do not understand."

"I will explain, sir. You are about to receive into your care a patient, a young man who is suffering from a dangerous wound. I have come to tell you, sir, that that young man's life is more precious to me than my own; that if he dies, his innocent blood will be the stain upon me which will drag me to my grave, and—and," she added in trepidation, "I wish you to receive this, and also my solemn assurance that the day the gentleman is pronounced out of danger, I will make you a rich man!"

She held a pocketbook toward me. I saw that it was filled with notes. I motioned it back.

"If you will permit me to kiss your hand," I said, "and hear your name, that is all I ask."

At this peculiar request she drew herself up, and a strange look passed over her face, but after a moment's hesitation she extended her left hand. I raised the fingers and touched them with my lips.

"Your name is——"

"The Duchess d'Azzeglio."

"Married?"

"Yes, married," she repeated; and as she spoke the words I felt unaccountably troubled and disappointed. What did it all mean? Was I mad, or dreaming? It seemed that I was both, for one look into that face had changed my whole nature. And who was this man whom I was about to receive under my care? was he her husband—or—but no, not even in thought could I couple evil with such a face as that.

I rubbed my eyes to make sure of my wakefulness; I turned again to speak to the lady—she was gone. I ran to the door and opened it; there was no sign of a soul.

More mystified than ever, I returned to my room, and the first thing I saw was the pocketbook lying upon my table. I put it safely away under lock and key, and then, strangely agitated, I sat down to await the arrival of my mysterious patient.

Here for the present must end the transcript from Dr. Priestly's note book. It is now necessary to chronicle the events which culminated in the mysterious episode of the wounded man.

CHAPTER II.

Three years before occurrence of the event chronicled in the preceding chapter, a lady was seated in a richly furnished dressing room in a house in Portland Place. It was 1 o'clock in the morning.

The lady, who was about 70 years of age, held a letter in her left hand, which hung at her side, and her whole attitude betokened expectancy.

At last there was a light tap upon the door and a young girl looked cautiously into the room, and crossing it, sunk upon the floor at the lady's feet.

"Dear grandmamma," she said, "it is so late for you to be up. When Osborne told me you wished to see me I could scarcely believe it. Is anything the matter?"

"Nothing is the matter that need alarm you, Constance. Why are you home so early?"

"The countess was indisposed, and wished to leave, so, of course, she brought me home. Grandma, that letter is from Frank, is it not?"

"Yes, dear."

"And it was to speak about that—that you determined to sit up until I returned from the ball?"

"Yes."

"Well," continued the girl, growing more nervous as she proceeded, "I had better tell you at once tha Frank was at the ball to-night, and—and he proposed to me again!"

This time the old lady did not speak, but her face grew hard as iron. The girl trembled, noticing the change.

"Ah, do not be angry, dear," she said, showering warm kisses on the withered hands. "Do not blame Frank. He loves me, and I—oh, I love him so much; if you persist in keeping us apart, I shall not care to live!"

"This is folly, Constance," returned the old lady, gravely.

"That was what you said last year, grandma, and then I thought you might be right; I did not know. And since you wished it so very much, I promised you that I would try to cease to care for Frank. Well, I have tried; for one whole year I have neither seen him nor heard from him, but when he came into the room to-night I felt that never, until my dying day, could I love another man. Grandma, tell me why it is you are so obdurate. Do you think Frank is unworthy? Do you not see that you are breaking his heart—and mine?"

"Yours? Why should your heart break? What have you in the world to wish for? You have a title which most girls would give their souls for and you have all my wealth!"

"Wealth—a title—what are they without happiness! I tell you, grandma, I would rather be the poorest beggar than lose my Frank."

"Then this is your final decision; you are determined to marry Frank Howarth?"

"Yes."

"Despite all my care and devotion, in spite of all the money I have endowed you with; despite the fact that all my life I have been working to secure your happiness, you refuse to grant the only request I have ever made."

"Oh, do not say so! I would do anything in the world but that."

"Anything but that! What other request have I ever made or am likely to make? Well, the matter must rest so, I suppose. Good-night."

Slowly and deliberately she rose, her left hand grasping the letter with a cruel, venomous grip. For a moment the girl watched her with streaming eyes and wildly beating heart; then the old lady stooped to kiss her, but her kiss was as cold as ice.

At 10 o'clock the next morning Mrs. Meason took her place in the breakfast room at 6 Portland place with as calm an air as if nothing whatever had occurred to disturb her serenity on the night before.

When at length Lady Constance entered her face was pale and her eyes showed signs of recent tears. It was the dreariest of breakfasts; scarcely a word was spoken by either of the ladies present. When the meal was over, and the servants had left the room, Lady Constance walked over to where the old lady sat and knelt beside her chair.

"My child," she said, "you have done of your own free will the deed I would have shielded you from. You have laid beneath your own feet a mine which may one day destroy you."

"Grandma," cried the girl in terror, "what do you mean?"

"I mean that the day you marry Frank Howarth all happiness for you will end. He has his own family traits. Had you been a different girl, had you been cold, hard-hearted and callous, I should have given a very different answer that day when this young man asked for your hand. I should have married you to him, and through your agency your mother might have been avenged. But I saw that, despite my stern training, you had grown into a tender, timid girl, capable of loving very deeply, and, seeing this, I knew that your cousin Frank was the last man on whom you should set your heart."

"You disliked him so much even then," said the girl, reproachfully.

"Do you expect to find a fig upon a pear tree or a rose upon a thistle? He is a Howarth; that is enough."

There was a knock at the door; the footman entered, bearing a card, upon which the old lady read:

"Captain Frank Howarth."

"I will come to the drawing room," she said, and the footman retired.

Constance leaped to her feet, her face turning from red to deathly white; her hands, which trembled violently, eagerly clutched her companion's dress.

"Grandma," she cried, "what will you say?"

"If I send him away your heart will break; if he remains"—the old lady sighed heavily—"Well, perhaps it is better to enjoy a few hours of happiness," she continued, "since the issue must be the same." With these words she left the room.

Fully an hour passed, when the door again opened, and this time the figure of a young man appeared. He stretched forth his arms.

"Constance," he said, softly. With a glad cry Constance fluttered across the room and fell upon his breast.

"One hour, Connie," said he; "but you were waiting for me, my love, so it seemed to you like three."

"Now you are laughing. If you do not become serious and tell me what I wish to know I shall go to grandma. She is so strange; I cannot understand her, Frank. Sometimes I think she hates me."

"Yes, she is very singular," returned the young man, gravely, "but she does not hate you, darling."

"Then why is she afraid to see me happy, Frank—do you know?"

"Yes; but the story is a very sad one. Why should our happiness be clouded at the outset?"

(To be continued.)

KNOWS HER BUSINESS.

Acts the Good Samaritan and Is Voted "a Bute" by the Boss.

There was a strike on a new building that is being rushed skyward on Belden avenue last week, but the places of the men who stopped work were quickly filled and the work went on.

Yesterday at noon when the new men came out of the building with their buckets to get them filled with beer at the saloon across the way a little crowd of strikers stood about the door.

One of them was a small thin man whose face was white with passion. His hand nervously clutched a small iron rod, and he looked eagerly at every man who passed him. One of the last to come out of the building was a tall, middle-aged German, whose clothes hung loosely upon his hungry-looking body and long, gaunt limbs. As he passed out of the door the little man with his iron rod sprang toward him with an oath, and yelled:

"You have got my job. My wife and children are starving, and I have come to kill you."

The other man stepped back, and the blood rushed over his face and his limbs trembled as he replied slowly:

"I do not know you. I work because, too, my wife and children they hungry. I haf not work for long time—three months now."

The little man sprang at him and struck him a savage blow across the face with the iron rod. The blow was harmless, but the next cut a long deep gash in the German's forehead and he sank in a double-up heap on the ground.

The little man dropped his iron rod and rushed off down the street, and the group of strikers about the door disappeared. A well-dressed, bright-faced young woman came quickly across the street. The workmen were standing about, gazing stupidly at the man on the ground. The young woman spoke sharply:

"Get some water and carry this man inside." She pulled off her gloves, and when the water was brought dashed it into the man's face. He blinked his eyes and sat up. She washed the blood from his face, gave one of the workmen money and ordered him to get a yard of bandage from the drug store.

In five minutes the lean old German was sitting on a pile of boards, holding his head in his hands, while the blood soaked through the bandage and trickled down through his fingers in a little stream.

The young woman sent for the boss, a fat, good-natured Swede, and said to him:

"This man must go home. He will be all right in the morning. Will you dock him for the half day?"

The boss grinned and passed his hand over his chin questioningly.

"Why, no, ma'am—I guess not, if you say so."

The young woman took this mixed reply to mean all she wanted, smiled at the boss, put on her gloves, and gathering up her skirts stepped out into the street and went away.

The fat foreman took the old German's arm and guided him to a street car. When he came back he looked around the group of open-mouthed workmen and said:

"Vell, she vas a bute, eh?"—Chicago Tribune.

Oak Stain.

Equal parts of potash and pearl ash, two ounces each to about one quart of water, give a good oak stain. Use carefully, as it will blister the hands. Add water if the color be too deep.

After several years of tireless warfare, and the payment of many thousands of dollars in bounties, the farmers of Berlen County, Michigan, have given up fighting the English sparrow pest.

A KILLING MACHINE.

LATEST INVENTION TO EXECUTE CRIMINALS.

The Victim's Neck Is Broken by a Downward Twisting Motion—Death Is Painless and It Does Not Mutilate the Subject.

Wringe the Neck.

Gruesome in the extreme are the man killing machines which the Ohio Legislature is being called upon to consider as substitutes for the gallows in the execution of criminals convicted of capital crimes. A couple of weeks ago the World described a steel mask designed to crush criminals' skulls, invented by an Ohio Legislator. Since then another Ohio inventor, George Jeremias, a young Columbus tinsmith, has come forward with a death-dealing machine more horrible, if possible, than any of the others.

This new device is designed to break the neck of the murderer on much the same principle employed by a country housewife in wringing the neck of a chicken. It combines the main feature of the Spanish garrote, the gallows and the electric chair. The victim sits in a chair of the ordinary shape, but very heavy and strong. The body is tightly strapped, as in the electric chair, and the head is secured to the head clamp. Over the top of the head a heavy metal helmet is lowered, being adjusted so as to fit tightly. A wide strap is passed around the neck, securing it in position against the block.

On the back of the chair is a drum in which a powerful spring is wound and set. The head clamp is not fixed to the chair, being free to move in upward, downward and spiral directions, under the impulse of the spring acting in the drum on the back of the chair. The spring is set free by a lever on the side of the chair.

THE DEATH CHAIR AS A STRETCHER.

At the moment set for the execution the spring is released and the projection, striking the protruding pin on the strap around the neck, imparts a violent downward and rotary movement to the head. This force is warranted to break the neck of any man not more powerful than an ox in a twinkling, causing practically instant death.

OHIO'S NEW KILLING MACHINE.

The death-chair is so constructed that it may be turned into a table. When the murderer's life is extinguished the back of the chair is lowered and the foot-rest raised so that the body is in a horizontal position for post-mortem treatment. The inventor claims many advantages for his device. By it, he says, the mishaps experienced and the pain and torture suffered from the present mode of executing criminals will be avoided, and the body may be delivered to the relatives of the deceased in a condition differing little from that in which it would be had he died naturally.—New York World.

EXTREMES IN HUMAN NATURE.

Hassan Ali, the Egyptian Giant, and Fritz Christian, the Swiss Dwarf.

The two extremes in human stature are men. The tallest man in the world is an Egyptian named Hassan Ali, 18 years of age, 8 feet in his stocking feet, and, what is very rare in giants as well as in dwarfs, good looking, having dark brown eyes, a full chin, small nose and prominent ears and lips.

THE LONG AND SHORT OF IT.

Fritz Christian, who is the antithesis of Hassan Ali, is a Swiss and only 2 feet 6 inches in height. Ali is young enough to grow taller, but Christian has reached his full stature, being now 23 years of age. He came to this country from Switzerland very recently and has made his home at Stony Creek Ohio.

Epitaph of an Indian Chief.

Just below the St. Augustine city gates, and in the first yard west of the corner of Granada street, in Orange street, is a large stone surmounting a mound, commemorating the burial place of Ptolomato, an Indian chief who lived in ages gone by. It is within a couple of feet of the front fence, yet undoubtedly is passed unnoticed by thousands of tourists. The inscription carved in the stone tells its own story, though interest would be added if the very peculiar style of lettering could be reproduced:

The Cream of Current Humor

The shy young man and timid maid
In silence wait from week to week,
Each wondering, modestly afraid,
Whose place it really is to speak.
—Washington Star.

"How was the bride given away?" "By her complexion."—Chicago Record.

Gazley—"Is it good to eat at night before going to bed?" Lazbey—"Be definite, man, is what good to eat?"—Roxbury Gazette.

Old Bachelor—"Now that your sister has married, it is your turn." Young lady—"Is that meant As an offer?"—Lustige Blatter.

"Thous hast a pretty wit," quoth the monarch. "Aye, and a dry humor," replied the jester. Whereupon the king pushed the button.—Philadelphia Record.

After the Ball.—First Sweet Thing—"Jack says Miss Passe didn't look twenty last night." Second Sweet Thing—"No. She looked thirty-five!"—New York Tribune.

Corroborated. — New-Yorker — "Are Philadelphians as slow as New-Yorkers think they are?" Philadelphian (surprised)—"Do New-Yorkers think we're slow?"—Truth.

"It is sad," said one girl, "that so many men nowadays have a great deal more money than brains." "Yes," sighed another; "and so little money at that."—Washington Star.

"Kitty, why has our French Revolution Club called an extra meeting?" "Oh, Nan, we are so bothered; we can't find out whether we're read two volumes or three."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Belle—"You know Jack Giddiboy, of course; don't you think he is just out of sight?" Sadie—"Indeed he is! a very personification of the old saying, 'out of sight out of mind.'"—Boston Courier.

'Tis well your heaviest wraps to wear
When you a-skating go,
E'en though for frost you do not care;
They break the fall, you know.
—Washington Star.

"I understand your daughter has given up bicycle riding." "Yes. She sold her wheel as soon as she found out she couldn't wear high-heeled shoes on it with any degree of success."—Chicago Evening Post.

Hoax—"Timley went to Alaska prospecting for gold, and found lead instead." Joax—"Ah! In large quantities, I suppose, and valuable." Hoax—"No; in small quantities, and fatal."—Philadelphia Record.

Mamma—"What do you mean by taking that piece of cake? When you asked for it didn't I say no?" Tommy—"You did; but last night I heard papa say that when a woman says no she always mean yes."—Truth.

Dolly—I hear Mary Antique was a great belle at the dance the other evening. She told me she danced every dance. Polly—Oh, yes. Mary's just the kind of a girl to be a belle at a leap-year dance.—Harvard's Bazar.

Here's a motto that's as certain
As that two pints make a quart:
Time and tide will wait for no man,
Little, big, or long or short.
—Philadelphia Item.

She—Oh, yes; I know that you think that woman is a silly creature, whose head can be turned by mere finery. He—It is sure to be turned if some other woman passes with the mere finery on.—Indianapolis Journal.

Mrs. Greene—Of course, you read all your husband's stories? Mrs. White (wife of the popular author)—Oh, dear, no! They are nothing to the stories he sometimes tells me after he has been out of an evening.—Boston Transcript.

Office Boy—There is a man outside who wishes to see you. Business Man—Didn't I give orders that I was not to be disturbed? Office Boy—Yes, sir; but this is a very mild-looking man. I don't think he would create a disturbance.—Truth.

Maud—I hear proposing parties are all the style this winter. The girls do the proposing and the one who proposes the best gets the prize. Have you been to any? Ethel—No; but I had a proposing party come to me the other evening. How do you like my ring?—Harper's Bazar.

Bellefield—A cynical writer remarks that a wedding always brings happiness to two, the florist and the clergyman. Bloomfield—He forgets the father of the bride, especially if the poor man has half a dozen other daughters on his hands.—Pittsburg Chronicle Telegraph.

"The natural history class will now write down the names of twelve Arctic animals," said the teacher in monotonous tones. Little Johnnie dashed off the following and handed his slate proudly to the teacher: "Ix seals, five polar bears and one walrus."—New York Evening Sun.

"Willie," said the boarding-house mistress to her young son, "I was ashamed of you at dinner. You kept your arms on the table during the entire meal!" "Yes, mamma," was the hopeful's reply; "I didn't want to give the boarders a chance to say there was nothin' on the table."—Yonkers Statesman.

How He Got His Title.

King Charles the Second, as he was passing through the courtyard of St. James' palace one day, saw Nell Gwynn at one of the windows with her infant in her arms. As he saluted her, the clever woman leaned out of the casement, holding the child in mid-air.

"What will you do for your son?" she cried.

"Nothing," said Charles, laughing.

"Then I will drop him out of the window," retorted Nell, holding the baby as if about to loose him.

"God save the Earl of Burford," cried Charles, and the child was drawn back to the safe shelter of his mother's arms.

I will sing you now a song
Of a binder light and strong,
With its bolt holes square and right
So you can bolt 'em all up tight;
And no extra wrench will use
To tighten bolts or screws.

It has a spring balanced reel
Which makes it nice to work;
And it is balanced up so nice
It cuts without a jerk.
It has a nice spring seat
Which makes it nice to ride.

This binder has a great drive wheel 10x34 inches, which makes it run very light. The drver thinks he is on a buggy, but when he sees the bundles roll, and all bound so nice and tight, he sees his mistake. It is the Osborne Columbia Binder. If you need anything in the line of farm implements it will pay you to see these goods before you buy.

THURSDAY.....APRIL 2, 1896

POLETICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

EDITOR COURIER:

You will please announce my name as a candidate for Congress from the 12th Congressional Disrrict, subject to the Democratic nominating convention to be held at Kendallville, April 7, 1896.

JAMES M. ROBINSON.
Fort Wayne, Ind.

Special Train.

Special train to Kendallville to the democratic convention, April 7. Leaves Ft. Wayne over Lake Shore at 8:30 a. m. and goes via Waterloo, giving delegates all along, a chance to go and return.

CAUCUSES.

The democrats of Richland met Saturday and elected Daniel Thomas for congressional delegate and G. W. Maxwell for senatorial.

The democrats of Concord met at St. Joe Saturday evening and had a rousing meeting. Sol Barney was made chairman and G. W. Woodcox secretary. There were speeches and resolutions and a general old fashioned democratic love feast. Several former democrats who had wandered from the fold, following strange populist gods, came into the caucus and renewed their allegiance to the only real "people's party" the county ever saw, the democratic party, the party that for a century has fought for the rights of the people against all encroachments. Among them was Frank Herrick who was the candidate for recorder on the populist ticket at the last election. The lists of delegates are in another column.

DeKalb Co. S. S.

The executive committee of the DeKalb County Sunday School Association will meet at the Lutheran church in Auburn at 1 p. m. on April 9, to arrange a program and decide time and place of the annual convention and for any other business that may come befor them. It is hoped to have a full meeting.

L. W TREESH, Pres.
M. E. OLDS, Sec'y.

WATERLOO.

Daniel Stroh continues to fail in health. Sunday, he was unconscious, and will not likely hold out much longer.

Saturday evening we had a brisk thunder shower, but it come off bright at the close.

The Rebekahs will give an entertainment the latter part of this week. There will be a literary program.

Harold Blair came down from Laporte Saturday and will spend the vacation week with his grandfather, Gen. Blair.

Mrs. H. M. Finch, of Minneapolis, Minn., has been visiting her sister, Mrs. Winslow, for a few day. She left Saturday for Chicago, and returns home some time this week.

Mrs. Rose, of Auburn, visited the "Minerva Club" of Waterloo, Tuesday afternoon March 24. She is always welcome.

Geo. Braun and his two daughters, of Ft. Wayne, has improved a short vacation in visiting his father's family here.

Mrs. Gill had her opening millinery Friday and Saturday last. She surpassed herself over her previous displays.

E. A. Zerkle hung out his banner from the Winslow block on Wayne St. Wednesday, 25, where he has a fine business room, and opportunity to display his large assortment of groceries, and provisions, etc.

CORUNNA.

Rev. Edgar held his third quarterly meeting here last Saturday and Sunday. Elder Tussing preached in the forenoon and at night.

Edward Orr has been quite poorly for some time, but is slowly improving.

Emery Shook closed his term of school last Friday.

Rev. Yeager is conducting a series of meetings at this place with a fair prospect of doing some good.

We understand that the reason the comet failed to collide with the earth was because it couldn't find a soft place to strike. We think the true reason was, that it was afraid to strike while this fighting congress is in session.

M. A. Peterson and wife, of Lima, Ind., are the guests of James DeLong and family.

G. S. Helmer moved back to Kendallville last week.

'Squire Maxwell had a nice fresh lawsuit on his hands last week between some Garrett parties. The jury failed to agree, and it was tried here again on Monday of this week.

Mrs. Wm. Murphy received a telegram last Friday announcing the death of her father, James Shade, of Findlay, Ohio. The remains were brought here on Saturday, and on Sunday the funeral services were conducted by Rev. Bumpus at Fairfield Center at 1 o'clock. After which the interment took place in the Fairfield cemetery. Truly, in the midst of life we are in death.

A Resemblance

No doubt exists in the line of Ready Made Clothing, but we loudly make this assertion that, "there is not a line in northern Indiana that honest comparison will place us anywhere but at the head of the procession." Competitors pattern after us, but never excel us.

We are Acknowledged Leaders,

Because Price has achieved us this broad distinction. Our Spring Trade has opened up beyond all imaginary expectations, and we are going to push it to the full extent of our ability.

We Sell for Cash and Right Prices

Which is building for us a trade that promises to reach gigantic proportions Not until you have inspected our complete line will you be able to appreciate the efforts made in your behalf in bringing everything that Spring Styles can produce. You will find that the abuses the consumers have long suffered are about exterminated.

We Regulate the Price of Clothing,

So that competitors will not take all you can earn in buying your necessary apparel.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF OUR PATRONS and the many new customers which each season brings us, we take great pleasure in announcing our display of

EASTER HATS,

The opening of the season find us well prepared to take care of the rush of spring business that our long experience and well selected stock is sure to bring us.

Fashion makers have provided an endless line of beautiful novelties in hats of medium sizes for spring, and with them the essential roses, violets and foliage, some of which are wonderfully natural.

Ribbons in the warp prints and ombre effects must meet with wide favor, and the hat that does not show a jeweled ornament is a rare exception.

The light spring ganzes, chiffons, crepes, etc., are a decidedly new fashion.

Remember that we take great pleasure in showing you our stock. We appreciate past patronage and shall endeavor to merit a continuance of the same.

Grand Easter Opening of Stylish Millinery,

APRIL 1, 2, 3 and 4.

Deft fingers have twisted and twined bits of prettiness into some of the most charming Hats of the year. Wonderful what a touch of dashiness and style those up-to-date millinery artists can give to a hat with a few dabs of ribbon, and jet and feathers, and what not! Here are some of the loveliest conceits of the best milliners in Christendom. There will be hundreds looking for something stylish to put right on, and will find it here. We never were so well equipped to please you in Stylish Millinery as we are to-day.

Women's Wraps

Marvels of taste and elegance. Generous too. Lay one of the full sweep Capes on the carpet—a complete circle. Note the work; could it be nearer perfection? Surely the choosing was done by some one who knew every possibility of the market as well as every quirk of fashion. And not a Cape or Wrap among them all but is thoroughly practical as well as rich and beautiful.

Dress Goods & Silks

are in the full swing of the great movement. We were never before so well equipped to do better than you hope in all things that touch women's wear and home comforts and beautifying.

—The Waterloo Press compliments the fairness of the COURIER like this: "Editor Barns, of the DAILY COURIER, gave a very fair two column write up of the district convention held at Auburn last Thursday. That is the way to do with a newspaper. Give the news, no matter of what political faith." We are pleased that our contemporary has realized that the COURIER is the fairest dealing paper in this section. It belittles no one, and uses the "gall of bitterness" sparingly, or never. But looking over the past few months of the Press, and noting its slurs and flings at democrats and democracy, we could almost wish that Bro. Willis could follow the COURIER'S good example for a while at least,

Thursday's Daily.

—Geo. Walker, of Smithfield, called to see us to-day. He was here to pay his taxes and for other business.

—J. D. High, now at Concordia Kansas, has thanks for a remittance. The distant boys always remember the COURIER.

—P. P. Lochner was up here to-day from South Jackson with a buggy load of the fine maple syrup he is making. He finds ready sale for it.

—Ed. Morrell, of Wolcottville, who formerly was connected with the Auburn Foundry is in the city the guest of his son-in-law Chas Kruse.

—E. A. Benedict is resting quite well to-day. He says the burns do not hurt in the least. His face is swollen so people scarcely recognize him.

—A man at Hicksville is said to be buying up live woodchucks. He probably wants to practice hunting them and is too lazy to go outside the door yard.

—Orland home talent has been playing "Pinafore," at that place, Angola and other town. It would tickle Tom Mays to see the old play once more.

Ft. Wayne wants a new court house although to an outsider she seems to have a pretty good one already. They expect it to cost about $500,000, a half million.

—B. J. Lowrey, now at Howard, Michigan, gives an illstrated write up of the trip of the Michigan editors, who have just returned from an expedition to New Orleans, Mexico, etc. They evidently had a grand time.

—'Squire Barney, of Spencerville, don't wait till his subscription gets behind, and sends it "overland" at an early date, if the roads are too muddy to come to town.

—Our old friend, Jacob Fetter was transacting business here to-day. His family is now all away from the farm. Two are in business at Kendallville, and three at Edgerton, and all doing well.

—Dr. F. B. Wood, of Garrett is now in Chicago, where he is taking a a course of study and work in diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat. He will return about June, and then enter on the practice of these specialties. We hope to see him succeed.

—J. F. Thorne, of Huntington Ind., has moved into this county, and will live on the Henry Shaffer farm in Jackson townihip. He has rented out his own farm in Huntington county and moves here to care for the property of Mrs. Henry Shafer who is his wife's mother.

—The front door of the rear coach on the south bound Lake Shore train this afternoon, blew shut on the other side of Waterloo and although the trainmen tried to get it unlocked, they had not succeeded when they reached Auburn. Of course people crowded onto that platform, but had to get down and go to the rear.

O. Z. Hubbell, now at Elkhart is likely to again represent his district in the state senate. Some one up there has probably found out that he is a DeKalb county man. But we feel there is a big objection to sending slender men like O. Z. to a legislature that is liable to close its sessions with a general slugging match. It takes muscle to be a consistent member of the Indiana legislature.

—Cuba may get more sympathy from Uncle Sam yet, than has been expected. Mills, one of the senators from Texas, has a bill before the senate, asking to have President Cleveland request Spain to give Cuba a better government, and if Spain refuses, then he is empowered to take possession of the island and hold it till good government is secured. This may not become a law, but it shows, we are beginning to realize our power, and perhaps our duty in the matter.

—The Goshen Times says there is to be a consignment of 100 Danish babies, to reach that city in a few days. The little fellows want to be adopted into American homes. Now there should go up a howl from the fellows who believe in "protection for protection's sake" as National Delegate Roby said in his speech at the republican convention last week. American producers and manufactures should be protected from the "pauper labor of Europe." The voters of the country should come to the rescue.

—The House of Representatives has passed the bill permitting ex-confederates to be appointed to service in the army and navy. Only one vote was against it in the House, that of Boutelle of Maine. Boutelle has not got over being mad because the rebels blew him up with a torpedo. There was a desperate naval fight in which Boutelle, then in the navy, took his full share, but a rebel torpedo, injired his boat and the boiler blew out a flue scalding him badly. He never forgave them, and probably never will.

—During the winter of 1883, F. M. Martin' of Long Reach, West Va., contracted a severe cold which left him with a cough. In speaking of how he cured it he says: "I used several kinds of cough syrup but found no relief until I bought a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough remedy, which relieved me almost instantly, and in a short time brought about a complete cure" When troubled with a cough or cold use this remedy and you will not find it necessary to try several kinds before you get relief. It has been in the market for over twenty years and constantly grown in favor and popularity. For sale at 25 and 50 cents per bottle by Davenport the Druggist. 14-18.

Saturday evening the Sons of Veterans held their 8th anniversary at the G. A. R. Hall. The attendance was large, in spite of the storm, and the exercises very entertaining. Among the literary items was an excellent address by Rev. J. N. Wilson, and recitation by Miss Olive Elson; music by the Wilcox family. Then there was an oyster supper that "just filled the bill," and all pronounced the annual meeting a success.

Altorney Welsheimer got his foot in it literally to-day walking home to dinner, when Mr Colwell came along behind him on a bicycle. Mr W stepped aside to let Mr. Colwell pass and in doing so, put his foot into a wide crack in the board sidewalk. The foot slipped in all right, but the sole of his shoe caught fast and he could not pull it out without tearing his shoe to pieces. He stood there till Ed. Weeks came with an ax and pried a board loose and relieved him. Welsheimer is now and always has been in favor good walks.

BILLIONS NAV. REGULATOR

is SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR—don't forget to take it. The Liver gets sluggish during the Winter, just like all nature, and the system becomes choked up by the accumulated waste, which brings on Malaria, Fever and Ague and Rheumatism. You want to wake up your Liver now, but be sure you take SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR to do it. It also regulates the Liver—keeps it properly at work, when your system will be free from poison and the whole body invigorated.

You get THE BEST BLOOD when your system is in A1 condition, and that will only be when the Liver is kept active. Try a Liver Remedy once and note the difference. But take only SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR—it is SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR which makes the difference. Take it in powder or in liquid already prepared, or make a tea of the powder; but take SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR. You'll find the RED Z on every package. Look for it.

QUEEN OF FESTIVALS.

THE DISTINCTION THAT IS GIVEN EASTER DAY.

Some Customs by Which It Is Observed—Why the Egg Is Symbolical of the Occasion—Legends and Superstitions Connected with It.

EASTER Sunday, which for centuries was observed only by certain churches, is now almost universally kept as a day of days, all evangelical churches symbolizing it as the anniversary commemorative of the resurrection of Christ, a festival which in the early Christian era was distinguished as the Sunday of joy, and which Gregory Nazianzen 1,500 years ago called the "Queen day of days, that excels all others as far as the sun exceeds the other stars, and which is still known in the east as the 'bright day.'" Another typical name for Easter is the "Holiday of Hope."

There is a wonderful charm and fascination in this queen festival of the year, which dominates the whole world with its wonderful lessons of returning life. Not only is the deep religious significance of the occasion illustrated in the most attractive and beautiful form as a lesson to the eye, and through that to the heart, but the joyful features of Easter, the upspringing of hope and the miracle of returning life, inspire a condition of joy and happiness in the lives of young and old, and the most insensible object becomes a part of the carnival of joy.

Easter was not kept as a festival until the fifth or sixth century, but previous to that the question of establishing it as a feast day came before the council of Nice, when it was decided authoritatively that Easter was henceforth to be the Sunday following the 14th day of the calendar moon which happened upon or next after the 21st of March, so that if this 14th day be a Sunday, Easter was not to be on that date but on the next following Sunday. Easter day, therefore, may be any day within five weeks inclusive of March 22 and April 25. It cannot happen earlier nor later than those two dates. In 1883, Easter occurred on March 25, and again in 1894, which will be twice in the present century. In 1951 it will occur again on March 25.

It has often been asked why an egg is the symbol of Easter. The use of eggs for Easter can be traced to the theology and philosophy of Egyptians, Persians, Gauls, Greeks and Romans, among all of whom an egg was a symbol of the universe, the work of the Supreme Divinity. The Persians gave presents of eggs at the feast of the vernal equinox—in honor of the renewal of all things. The Jews adapted it to suit the circumstances of their history as a type of their departure from Egypt, and it was used in the feast of the passover as part of the furnishing of the table with the Paschal lamb. The early Druids also used the egg in their ceremonies.

The custom of coloring Easter eggs seems to be as old as the use of the egg as a symbol. In Germany sometimes instead of eggs at Easter, a curious print illustrative of their use is presented. An Easter custom brought from Mesopotamia is that of egg-rolling or egg-pitting. The manner of this sport is to strike the eggs one against the other, until one is broken, which is the spoil of the owner of the egg which remains whole. Another egg is then pitted against the winning one, and so on until the last one is victorious.

Every year at Washington the children of all classes of people meet in the grounds of the White House, and with the President and his family looking on, and great crowds of spectators in attendance, proceed to roll eggs of all the colors known to humanity, and in such quantities that it would seem as if the hens of all the world had contributed. It is one of the sights of Washington on Easter Monday. In this country eggs of all colors are used for the rolling sport, but in Mesopotamia they are red only, in remembrance of the crucifixion.

In France it was once customary at the approach of Easter to seek the largest eggs as a tribute to the king, and when the Easter high mass was finished, in the chapel of the Louvre, to take them into the royal presence, handsomely gilded and carried in pyramids. Then the chaplain blessed them, after which they were distributed to the people.

Easter Eggs.

The use of eggs on Easter Day, sometimes called Pasche, or paste eggs, has come down to the present time, writes Jane Scarle in an article on "Easter and Easter Customs," in the Ladies' Home Journal. Eggs were held by the Egyptians as a sacred emblem of the renovation of mankind after the Deluge. The Jews adopted them to suit the circumstances of their history as a type of their departure from the land of Egypt.

They were also used in the feast of the Passover. Hyde, in his description of Oriental sports, tells of one with eggs among the Christians of Mesopotamia on Easter Day, and forty days afterward: "The sport consists in striking their eggs one against another, and the egg that first breaks is won by the owner of the one that struck it. Immediately another egg is putted against the winning egg, and so on till the last egg wins all the others, which their respective owners shall before have won."

In Germany, sometimes instead of eggs at Easter, an emblematical print is occasionally presented. One of these is preserved in the print-room of the British Museum. Three hens are represented as upholding a basket, in which are placed three eggs ornamented with representations illustrative of the Resurrection; over the center egg the "Agnus Dei," with a chalice representing faith; the other eggs bearing the emblems of charity and hope.

A German Custom.

A German Easter custom is to light fires on the hillside of the Hartz, obtaining the holy water from the streams at midnight, when the good spirit moves the waters, and the presentation of cakes, shaped in the form of the rising sun, are made special features of the occasion.

Eggs-actly the Easter Style.

AN EASTER DAY.

Shall it be a song or sonnet?
Sooth! it must be something gay;
Bess has got a stunning bonnet
She will don on Easter day.
I can see her in my fancy,
As she marches up the aisle,
With a nameless necromancy
In the sunshine of her smile.

She's the loveliest of lassies
Ever winged a Cupid-dart;
Every gallant when she passes
Will have failure of the heart.
Every belle—my word upon it—
Will with jealousy grow gray,
When sweet Bessie in her bonnet
Treads the aisle on Easter Day.

I would give a feudal castle—
(All my castles are in Spain!)
And the wealth of lord and vassal—
(All my wealth is in my brain!)
If I might—to think upon it
Fairly takes my breath away!—
March with Bessie and her bonnet
Up the aisle on Easter Day.

HER clothes were certainly very ragged; no one could dispute that. Her toes were rebellious and objected to staying in her boots. 'Lis'beth looked at them despairingly. She was only nine, yet she could reason: "If I was as cold as my feet am," she mused, "and had any place to go, I just wouldn't stay out in the cold."

Nearly all that day she had wandered up and down the city street looking for a home. Her father had left her three days before on a drunken spree, with no place in particular to lay her head. During those three days she had eaten nothing but a piece of bread an old Irish woman had given her. Suddenly she made up her mind she would go up where the rich people lived and see if they didn't want a little girl. "So much money to spare," said 'Lis'beth, "somebody'll surely take me." Poor little trusting soul!

She turned her steps and went toward the west. The short winter twilight had already commenced to deepen as she climbed a flight of long stone steps and timidly rang the bell. How warm it looked inside, she thought. A servant came to the door and regarded the ragged mite before her curiously. "What do you wish for?" she asked, not unkindly.

"Please, marm, a home," said 'Lis'beth.

The girl laughed. "There is none here for you," she answered, and closed the door.

'Lis'beth sank down on the doorstep, stunned and sobbing. The door behind her opened softly once more, and a little boy looked out. He had heard the servant's description of the little waif, and his childish heart was touched.

"I've brought you somefin'," he said, putting a large napkin into her hands, filled with hastily snatched goodies from the dining room. "Eat it quick, before Nurse finds me! No, wait a minute, and I'll get you a present." And he ran into the house. His little heart was filled with pity for this poor little girl whose mamma was dead, and whose papa was drunk—most always. He came back in a moment and pressed a flower pot into 'Lis'beth's hands.

"Keep it where it's warm and sunny," he said hurriedly. "By and by it'll be pretty. It's an Easter lily. I must go now. Nurse is calling me. Good-by, little girl."

He stooped and touched his childish lips to hers, then shut the door, leaving 'Lis'beth alone once more, this time thoroughly dazed. No one had ever kissed her since her mother died, and the unfamiliar caress burned deep into her warm little heart and comforted it.

Down the avenue, past the beautiful houses she went, knowing now they were not for her. It snowed faster and faster, and 'Lis'beth's tired little feet just managed to drag themselves over the ground. By and by she crawled under the shelter of a friendly porch and wrapped her precious plant tight in her skirts to keep it warm. All around her that night people lay in soft, warm beds, and shivering said how cold it was. 'Lis'beth said nothing. She only waited. God must have made a mistake, she thought, that would come right in time. Perhaps her prayers hadn't reached him yet. It was a long way to heaven.

When she opened her eyes again, it was to find herself in a clean, white bed, with sunlight streaming in at the window opposite, and a pleasant warmth in the air. On a little stand beside her bed was her pet companion, the Easter lily.

"Is this heaven?" said 'Lis'beth. "Has God got my prayer? Do you help God take care of folks?"

"No, dear," answered a woman. "This is only the hospital, and I am your nurse. I am going to take care of you and get you nice and strong."

February passed, March came and went and April dawned. 'Lis'beth still lay in her bed, making no complaint, but wasting day by day. The wonderful lily had a wonderful bud, and 'Lis'beth watched it grow and swell with eager eyes. "It will be open for Easter, dear," one of the nurses said to her one day.

"What's Easter?" asked 'Lis'beth, wonderingly.

So Nurse Mary told her of the Lord of the children, pointing Him out in the picture that hung on the wall, among the little throng. Told of how He died, and how on the third day the angels rolled the stone away from the tomb, and the living Lord came out, "and that is Easter," said Nurse Mary.

'Lis'beth pondered and her eyes turned wistfully toward the lily bud, but she said nothing. Easter morning dawned clear and beautiful, the lily had opened. 'Lis'beth eagerly stretched out her lean little arms towards it.

"Will you break it off for me?" she asked, and looked at it attentively for a moment. "I think it is very pretty," she said, "but I don't know about the Lord. I mean to give it to him. Is it good enough, do you think?"

"Darling," said the nurse, "to-day you shall go to the Lord and take him your lily. He will like it, I know."

She heaved a contented little sigh. "It'll be a long ways," she whispered. "I guess I'll go to sleep and rest a bit."

THE BOY TOUCHED HIS LIPS TO HERS.

The nurse bent over the dying child with eyes filled with tears, and watched the breath flutter between the pale lips. It was only a slight flutter, fainter and fainter!

Then it went out, and 'Lis'beth gave her Easter lily to the Lord on Easter morn.—Ladies' Home Journal.

EASTER'S SIGNIFICANCE.

Beautiful Sentiment Expressed by the Late Phillips Brooks.

And now comes Easter morning! What does it mean? Do you see it? Every old guess and dream and hope becomes suddenly lighted up with certainty. Lo, it is true! Death is not the end of all things. Here is a man, the truest, realest man (we often forget that about Jesus Christ, but so He was), the realest man that ever lived; He died, and see, He still lives. Then we, too, do not die in death. We thought so. Now we are sure of it. This life here is a part, not a whole. It is worth while to struggle, however shapeless and crude the work is when we have to lay it down over night, for there is a to-morrow coming.

The world's poor heart knows very well what it wants. For years and years it longed to see one man rise from the dead. If it could only have that! It could let many other questions go unanswered, but, oh, for some light on that darkness—oh, for some sound out of that silence! If it could have that, then its bonds would be broken; its whole pale life flooded with color; its best truths verified completely, and a hope lighted upon every grave. No longer should spiritual philosophy labor under the burden of materialism; no longer should the dying die in terrible doubt, and the mourners go hopelessly about the streets. My friends, the world's prayer is answered. A true man has risen from the grave. Life and immortality are brought to light.—Phillips Brooks, D. D.

An Easter Legend.

"Will the sun really dance on Easter?"
Questioned the Lenten devotee.
On Easter morn she rose betimes
To hear the merry ringing chimes,
The spectacle of joy to see.
Dame Fashion from her thrall released her
To watch the dancing sun at Easter.

Did the sun dance for her at Easter?
She saw its rays of glory shine
In greeting at the break of day;
Young Cupid met her by the way,
Love cast o'er her his glamour fine,
All nature offered joys to feast her
Her heart danced with the sun at Easter.

Easter Superstitions.

There are many superstitions connected with Easter Sunday which are significant of the season, and are almost as imperative as laws. One of these is the necessity of having something new to wear on this day in order to insure happiness for the coming year. Hence the Easter bonnet. Another one is that on that day the sun dances. This is an old legend, and the lines from Sir John Suckling are well known:

"But oh, she dances such a way—
No sun upon an Easter day
Is half so fair a sight."

It is also claimed in heathen countries, where the superstition originated, that the lambs frisk and dance in the light of the rising sun on Ostro, the name of a heathen divinity who was also represented as dancing and who gave to our Easter its name.

A JOYOUS EASTER.

NOTES ON EDUCATION.

MATTERS OF INTEREST TO PUPIL AND TEACHER.

Scolding, Nagging and Punishing Are the Poorest Tools a Teacher Can Use—How to Treat Dull Pupils—Object of Discipline.

Routine of First Weeks.

If at one time more than another patience is required in the schoolroom, it is during these first two or three weeks of the term. There is so much to be done before everything gets in the smooth-running, orderly state we desire, so many things to explain and teach.

The beginning of the term was a great trial to me when I commenced teaching, but after a few sessions I began to see how useless it was to expect the whole machinery to be in working order in two or three days. I learned not to despair even when, at the end of two or three weeks, the general orderliness of the room was not satisfactory.

Be patient. Remember that the children are unaccustomed to your ways, perhaps are strangers to the school and district. They may be trying, to their ability, to please you, and yet fail utterly to reach your standard.

Be cheerful. Scolding, nagging and punishing are the poorest tools you can use. Inspire the children with a desire to be orderly in every detail, quiet, courteous, helpful, thoughtful for the comfort of others, trustworthy—in short, to do their best in all things. In addition to the inspiration of a love of order, drill of different kinds is necessary—taking slates, standing up, coming to and going from class, position of attention, position when asking or answering questions; in regular questions, when the pupil should always stand, and that without lolling on desk or seat when addressing the teacher—lining, marching, etc. All these movements should be automatic. A command should be divided into two parts, the first consisting of a cautionary word; the second, the action word, For instance, "Quick—march!" "Stand—up!" "Right about—turn!" No motion is made until the second, or action-word is heard, and then all move together.

Like many other good things, this schoolroom drill has been carried to great and foolish extremes, which have been injurious to the children and of no possible benefit to the work; but a moderate amount, especially with little children, is necessary if we would avoid much confusion and disorder. Without doubt, quiet, steady, orderly habits reflect positively on character. I believe disorder would be impossible in a class in which pupils had been trained to stand, march, pass and take books, slates, etc., with uniformity and precision. The habit of prompt and exact obedience is the cornerstone of the temple of order.

It pays one to devote considerable time during the first week or two to these external matters. Thorough drill should be given in standing, marching, dismissing, distributing and collecting books, etc. This done, there will not be the same necessity for frequent reminders, such as: "Stand straight up!" "Quietly!" "In step!" "Softly!"

During the term, if the children become careless, have a ten-minute practice after 4 o'clock.

A word or two regarding the general work of the term. Try the experiment of making a specialty of one subject this session. It may be Composition, Vertical Writing, Geography, or any other subject. Make special effort in it; all branches of the school work will profit by the "hobby," if it be a good one.

Do not think that you have no time for anything beside teaching. You will do much better work if you are improving your mind in some other direction. Make time for reading, and give educational works their just share. Don't lose interest in your work. You may be sure that the children will meet you half way in any whole-hearted plans for improvement or reform.—The Educational Journal.

Teaching to Think.

Good teachings secures good thinking. One with limited capacity can feed facts to children as he would swill to swine, and then ask questions to see what they retain, as he would weigh swine to see what they have gained. It requires both tact and talent to lead a child to think keenly upon a single fact, as it does to get reliable speed even from a blooded colt. It is not enough that the mind be active when the facts are received, which is the standard with too many would-be education leaders. This merely secures good movement, but neither speed nor endurance. A child must keep up his thinking when he is out of the teacher's hands. Whoever has driven what is known as a "door-yard" horse, that prances furiously while you are trying to get into the carriage, and is equally ferocious when you would get out, but cares naught for the urging of voice or whip when on the road, has a good conception of the mental activity of children who are taught to dance attendance upon a teacher when she is having them "observe" under her eye, but gives them no training in strong or sustained thinking. Thinking is working one's knowledge into something no one else would produce with the same facts and conditions. The teacher who plans to have twenty children see the same thing in an object or event, and think the same things about it has not the raintest conception of what thinking really is.—Iowa Schools.

The Dull Pupil.

Do we not make serious mistakes in that we are always ready to censure the slow pupil? Here is little Olga, naturally timid, and seemingly dull. She is constantly failing. The teacher takes great pains to notice it, and when she calls her arithmetic class she keeps before her mind the too oft-repeated failures of the child. On calling for 4x5, all hands are raised save one; the child notices her teacher looking at her, and immediately becomes confused. Sarcasm and disgust are plainly written on the teacher's face. With "Of course, Olga, you don't know; you never do!" she passed on. Is not this a cruel thrust? Do we consider what we are doing? Do not let us make the dullard believe he "never knows," but help and encourage him with kind words and gentle ways. Let us cheer him on to quicker ways; encourage him with gentleness and sympathy. How much better for Olga if her teacher had said, "What, Olga! Don't you know? I'm sure you can answer as well as the rest. Now think a little while, and let me see your hand, too." Thus, by encouraging, we give them faith in themselves, and strength to do what before was seemingly hard. Dear comrades, if we have an Olga, do not let us chill all that is best in her, but help along a thousand times rather than hinder once.

"It is not so much what we say,
As the manner in which we say it."

The World's Rivers.

Not all these facts may be found in your geography.

The Tiber is only 230 miles long.

The world-famed Orontes is only 240 miles long.

The Zambesi, in South Africa, is 1,800 miles in length.

Slow rivers run at the rate of three to seven miles an hour.

Twelve creeks in the United States bear the name of the Rhine.

Every ancient city of note was located on or near the sea or a river.

The Ganges is 1,570 miles long and drains an area of 750,000 square miles.

The Hudson River, from its mouth to the lakes, is 400 miles in length.

The Mississippi and its tributaries drain an area of 2,000,000 square miles.

The branches of the Mississippi have an aggregate length of 15,000 miles.

For over 1,200 miles the Nile does not receive a single tributary stream.

The River Jordan had its origin in one of the largest springs in the world.

In islands of too small size to have rivers, creeks are dignified by that name.

The Connecticut, the principal stream of New England, is 450 miles in length.

During a single flood of the Yang-tse-Kiang, in China, 600,000 persons were drowned.

The most extensive protective river works in Europe are at the mouth of the Danube.

The Rhine is only 900 miles long, but drains a territory nearly double the area of Texas.

The Irtish, in Siberia, is 2,200 miles in length and drains 600,000 miles of territory.

The Nile, from its delta to the great lakes of Central Africa, is over 4,000 miles in length.

The Thames of England is 220 miles long. The river of the same name in Canada is 160.

There are twenty creeks in this country which have been dignified with the name of the Tiber.

The Columbia River of Canada is 1,400 miles in length; the stream of the same name in Oregon is 600.

The Arkansas River is 2,170 miles long, but at various points in its course it is very thin for its length.

The Potomac River is only 500 miles long and in its lower course is rather an estuary than a stream.

The British islands are better provided with rivers than any other country of the same size on the globe.

The Mississippi, at the point where it flows out of Lake Itaska, is ten feet wide and eighteen inches deep.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Object of Discipline.

School discipline is not for punishment, but for moral effect. The teacher's authority is not the thing to be vindicated, but the pupil's character is to be formed. The moral effect upon the pupil, upon the school as a whole, upon the community, and upon the future through the pupils are the ends to be sought. The school has a work to do that cannot be done by the teaching be it never so efficient. There is an influence to be exerted upon the character that can only come through habitual discipline of the school in the true sense. Not through a system of punishments, not through a system of rewards or checks, but through the direction of the conduct, the choices, and activities of the pupils are teachers to accomplish this character work.—Journal of Education.

An Obvious Advantage.

Fame has its penalties, eagerly as it is coveted by humanity. Few of those who shake the hands of public men on occasions of receptions held in their honor realize the effect of this process if long continued upon the person who submits to it. Inquiry of them would often elicit the fact that there were swollen hands or strained muscles and badly afflicted nerves at its result. President Polk had an experience of this kind which led him to study the art of shaking hands for his own protection, and this is his conclusion with regard to it, set down in his private diary: "If a man surrendered his hand to be shaken by one horizontally, by another perpendicularly, and by another with a strong grip, he could not fail to suffer severely from it; but if he would shake and not be shaken, grip and not be gripped, taking care always to squeeze the hand of his adversary as hard as the adversary squeezed him, he would suffer no inconvenience from it. I can generally anticipate a strong grip from a stronger man, and I then take advantage of him by being quicker than he, and seizing him by the tip of his fingers." This has the obvious advantage of demonstrating cordiality on the part of those who thus heartily grasp hands held out to them.

One of John Randolph's Similes.

Much new material is embodied in the article "John Randolph of Roanoke," by Powhatan Bouldin, in the Century. The following simile by Randolph is found in a note to a speech which he delivered in Congress:

A caterpillar comes to a fence; he crawls to the bottom of the ditch and over the fence, some of his hundred feet always in contact with the subject upon which he moves. A gallant horseman at a flying leap clears both ditch and fence. "Stop!" says the caterpillar; "you are too flighty, you want connection and continuity; it took me an hour to get over; you can't be as sure as I am, who have never quitted the subject, that you have overcome the difficulty and are fairly over the fence." "Thou miserable reptile!" replies our fox-hunter; "if, like you, I crawled over the earth slowly and painfully, should I ever catch a fox, or be anything more than a wretched caterpillar?"

Marion has decided to abolish the hitching rack about the public square. 'Twill be moved nearer the Court-house.

Fred Heinz, Clark County, is 20 years old, six feet seven inches high, weighs 250 pounds and wears a No. 13 boot.

The heroine of Muncie at present is Mrs. Ella Cothran, who rescued two women and three children from a carriage being kicked to pieces by a runaway horse.

The Excelsior clay works at Brazil will soon begin making clay shingles. The Crawford machine, which completes the shingles ready for drying at one operation, will be used.

Dr. F. B. King of Windfall, was seriously if not fatally burned by a natural gas explosion in a pumphouse. He was carrying burned paper by an open door when the gas ignited.

Franklin fire department employes have resigned because the City Council committee refused to report favorably on their petition to be given regular wages instead of so much for each fire.

A dead man was found in the south fork of Wild Cat Creek near Frankfort the other day by Carl Waddington who was hunting in the woods. The man is about middle age but cannot be identified.

A little son of Adam Chupp of Gravelton, got his father's razor for a plaything, and slipped up behind his sister to slice her ear off. Mother caught his arm in time to stop the blade when the ear was half off.

The Bell and Frankfort telephone companies are in competition at Frankfort. The former furnishes 'phones to business houses for 80 cents a month and to dwellings for 40 cents. The latter's rates are $1 for business houses and 50 cents for dwellings.

Dr. Rogers, superintendent of the Logansport Insane Asylum, thinks he has found a medicine that will cure catalepsy. Of two patients treated, one became entirely well and the other improved. The medicine is a preparation from the thyroid glands of sheep.

A freight train on the Vandalia was wrecked six miles east of Greencastle. The accident was caused by a broken truck. Seven cars left the rails, four of them loaded with live stock, but little of it injured, however. No one was hurt and the passenger service was only slightly delayed.

Wesley Linville, 17 years old, an employe of the American carbon works at Noblesville, was found dead in the dynamo room recently. The cause is a mystery, as no signs appeared on the body to indicate a shock from the dynamo. He was seen three minutes before and was at his usual work.

Fred Kaler, aged 50, while mounting a Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton passenger train at the Rushville depot fell between the cars and was instantly killed. He was a Prussian by birth and served in the German army in the Franco-Prussian war, and witnessed the taking of Paris. He leaves a wife and child at his home in Glenwood.

Mrs. C. C. Maynard of Anderson, was terribly burned about the face, arms, and head while smothering the flames that were threatening the life of her 3-year-old daughter. The child's clothing caught fire while it was playing near a grate. The clothing was burned from its body and the hair singed, but only a few blisters on the body were found. Mrs. Maynard will recover from her injuries.

Many deaths from pneumonia have occurred in the northern part of Scott County in the past few days. Saturday night David Butt, aged 68 years, died. On the same night Mrs. James Jones and child died; Friday night a child of Joseph Sample died, and on Monday night another child of Mr. Sample died, and also Mrs. Hiram Carlock. The community seems afflicted, as several others are lying at the point of death in that locality.

Patents have been awarded to the following residents of Indiana: George H. Brower, Roann, evaporating pan; Henry C. Ham, assignor to Rude Brothers' Manufacturing Company, Liberty, cultivator; George C. Pyle, assignor of one-half to F. H. Ewart, Indianapolis, electric arc lamp; Michael J. Roach, Anderson, pulp washing machine; Edward Sterling, Fort Wayne, check holder; Charles L. Zuelke, Furnessville, railway guard gate.

The first enumeration under the new law of persons of school age in the State will be taken April 10 and 20. The law exacts things that were not formerly required. The object of the new law is to prevent "padding." For years evidences of fraudulent returns have been numerous at the office of the Superintendent of Public Instruction. On account of the limited time for taking the enumeration it will be necessary in Indianapolis and other large cities in the State, for the enumerator to engage a large force to do the work.

The gas-pumping station of the Richmond Natural Company, located near Chesterfield, was wrecked by an explosion, both ends of the big boiler blowing out. Two men who were at work in the building, Sam Remington and Superintendent Addison, were painfully injured. Remington was struck by a flying piece of the boiler and burned by hot water and steam, while Superintendent Addison fared almost as badly in the rush of flame, steam and water. The explosion was due more to natural gas than to steam. It seems that gas was leaking and the men were there to make repairs. The gas collected in some of the flues and when the flame reached it a terrific explosion resulted. Remington was unconscious for some time, but is now out of danger.

E. W. Farmer, principal of the North Anderson schools, who disappeared in a mysterious fashion, ten days ago, was captured in Florida and brought home. It is feared he is insane. Some think he was making his way toward Cuba. Farmer refuses to say anything about the affair.

Two years ago, while reading a newspaper, Samuel Piper, aged 80 of Greensburg, suddenly went blind. The other night the family was having religious services when the old gentleman picked up the Bible and said that he wished he could read the good book. His sight came back as suddenly as it had left him. Is this a reflection on the newspaper?

Drs. W. A. Frankenberger and J. C. Kimball, Madison, are charged with violating the health law of the State in failing to report deaths. Both are members of the Grant County Medical Society and are supported by that body. It is probable that the constitutionality of the health law will be tested in the Supreme Court.

Will and George James of Muncie, brothers, and poor men, have received word that they are two of four equal heirs to an estate of $100,000, left by their grandfather, who died several days ago in Greenfield, Ohio. It was thought he was penniless, but a safe which was not known to be in his house was discovered, and when opened money and papers valued at $100,000 were found.

Smooth Wire Fencing for Farming.

There is no question but what smooth wire fencing is bound to take the place of all other styles of fence for farm purposes. The progressive and successful farmer has already realized this and is making preparations to profit by the use of it. Land is too valuable to not be able to pasture every field as soon as the crop can be removed. It has been demonstrated in many ways that those pastures will, inside of two years, pay for inclosing the field with a close mesh smooth wire fence itself. Besides, it keeps stock healthy and seems to be the only true method of keeping the hog cholera out of your herds.

The DeKalb Fence Co., of DeKalb, Ill., whose illustrated card appears in another column of this paper, are turning out the best and most substantial line of smooth wire fencing yet presented to the farming community, and at prices, too, considering quality and durability, which bring this kind of fencing within the reach of all. Free illustrated catalogue can be obtained by addressing DeKalb Fence Co., 320 High street, DeKalb, Ill.

Neatly Turned.

Dr. Johnson paid a pretty compliment to Mrs. Siddons when, for the moment, he had no chair to offer her: "Madam, you who so often occasion a want of seats to other people will more easily excuse the want of on yourself."

A Spring Trip South.

On April 7 and 21, and May 5, tickets will be sold from principal cities, towns and villages of the north, to all points on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad in Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida and a portion of Kentucky, at one single fare for the round trip. Tickets will be good to return within twenty-one days, on payment of $2 to agent at destination, and will allow stop-over at any point on the south bound trip. Ask your ticket agent about it, and if he cannot sell you excursion tickets write to C. P. Atmore, General Passenger Agent, Louisville, Ky., or Jackson Smith, D. P. A., Cincinnati, Ohio.

A Gentlemanly Judge.

In a conversation the other day District Attorney Graham told of his twenty-five years' experience at the bar with the late Judge Allison, and incidentally paid a sterling compliment to the dead jurist. "He was," said Mr. Graham, "a splendid judge, with a stock of patience that was inexhaustible. No lawyer can ever say that he was ever turned away from Judge Allison's bar without a kindly, courteous, complete hearing. His bearing both on and off the bench reminded me always of a passage in 'David Copperfield,' where Dickens writes, in effect, that 'a man might assume a gentlemanly demeanor for an occasion, but it is only nature's true nobleman who never lays it aside.'"—Philadelphia Record.

MOTHERS MUST GUIDE.

Should Watch the Physical Development of Their Daughters.

Information They Should Furnish at the Proper Time—Knowledge by Which Suffering May Be Avoided.

Every mother possesses information of vital value to her young daughter. When the girl's thoughts become sluggish, with headache, dizziness, and a disposition to sleep, pains in back and lower limbs, eyes dim, desire for solitude, and a dislike to the society of children: when she is a mystery to herself and friends, then her mother should come to her aid.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound will, at this time, prepare the system for the coming change. See that she has it, and Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass., will cheerfully answer any letters where information is desired. Thousands of women owe their health to her and the Vegetable Compound, and mothers are constantly applying to her for advice regarding their daughters.

SORE EYES? Dr. ISAAC THOMPSON'S EYE WATER

The long Winter days are nearly over. A succession of Colds, Coughs or Pneumonia has weakened the system and strength doesn't seem to come back again. You remain pale and weak. You have a slight cough in the morning and perhaps a little fever in the afternoon. You need A Food as a Spring medicine, not a mere tonic. WILL OF J. K. POLK.

WAS A DOCUMENT WITH CURIOUS PROVISIONS.

He Desired to Perpetuate His Nashville Home—The Heirs Quarreled and Legal Troubles Began—A Broken Will and a Wrecked Estate.

Result of Litigation.

The city of Nashville, Tenn., like Rome, is built upon many hills. Crowning one of these hills, near the business center of the bright Southern city, is an L-shaped, very large lot, either end of the L facing streets that run at right angles. At the convergence of the L stands an old-fashioned brick residence, that, facing on one of the streets, shows a doric-columned, portico'd front, such as is so common in the South. The feature of the front which faces the other street is an old-fashioned ponderous door, around which there is a paneling of glass that is antique in its arrangement. Unkept lawns, uncared-for trees and shrubs, broken fences, and decrepit gates mark the fading away of a spot that was once the pride of the State of Tennessee; it was the home of a President of the United States. There is an uncared-for, paintless, musty, unattractiveness about the house that is forbidding, and it tells the story of the law's interference in dividing the property of a man who was deemed worthy and qualified to rule a nation, but who, it seems, did not know enough to make a will that would withstand the onslaught of the modern attorney.

JAMES K. POLK.

This place has for nearly three-quarters of a century been known as "Polk place," the home of James K. Polk, once President of the United States. On the streets on which the property faces, the hum of traffic rumbles and roars, the sharp clang of the electric car gongs are echoed back from its moldy walls and the only objects in keeping with its decadence are the ragged, indolent negroes who bask in the sunshine around its broken walls. The house stands far back in the yard from either street as if trying thus to hide its head in shame at its condition, or in fear of its strange surroundings; and well it might feel ashamed at the disregard with which the wishes of its builder have been treated by those who were of kinship to him. Said a stranger who noted me examining the old place:

THE RUINED HOMESTEAD OF PRESIDENT JAMES K. POLK.

"It's a queer old place, isn't it? President Polk was buried in a tomb that stood forty-five years where you note those broken rocks and that fallen column. It was his wish that his remains shoud rest there forever, and that those of his wife should lie beside him when she passed away. She survived him forty-three years. Then her remains were placed as they had both wished in yonder tomb that you see lying in ruins."

President Polk made a curious will. It begins in the usual form. "I, James K. Polk, a resident of the State of Tennessee, except four years a resident of Washington, D. C., while serving as President of the United tSates, do hereby will and bequeath," etc.

And particularly out of the ordinary was the disposition his will made of this property of which I am writing. It would seem that he sought to entail the estate, to so arrange it that it would forever remain in the Polk family, and be known as "Polk Place," and also be the resting place of him and his wife. In order to do this he willed "Polk Place" to the State of Tennessee in trust. At the death of his wife, it should go to the Governor of the State of Tennessee, as trustee, or in case of his failure to act or qualify as such trustee, then to the Legislature of Tennessee, to direct the trust and designate some blood relative of the name of Polk, who should occupy, have and hold the property then known and to be known as "Polk Place." The trustee, or trustees, in selecting the beneficiary of this trust, were to give preference to the nearest of kin of the name of Polk, if such person was deemed worthy of the trust. If there should no longer be a blood relative of the name of Polk, deemed worthy to enjoy this trust, then the trustees should select as the beneficiary one who should be a blood relative, though of other name.

For forty-three years the wishes of James K. Polk were complied with. In 1891 the widow, Sarah Childress Polk, died, and was laid away beside the maker of this curious will. Then the heirs fell to quarreling about the estate; the lawyers got in their work and broke the will. Now the estate is going to ruin, and the bodies of James K. Polk and his wife have been removed from the resting place they had chosen, and now lie buried in the State House yard. The court ordered the sale of this plot of ground, the proceeds to be divided among a swarm of heirs, the dividend to be in accordance with the claim each one established as to near or remote kinship with the man who made this property and tried to do as he liked with his own. It will be divided among ten heirs of the name of Polk, seven heirs of the name of Caldwell, seven heirs of the name of Walker, three of the name of Vaulx, and so on to the number of fifty-three; and according to the directions of the court, the proceeds of the sale will be divided among them as follows: Four will get one-twelfth each, five will get one-thirty-sixth each, seven will get one forty-secondth each, six will get one fifty-fourth each, eight will get one ninety-sixth each, nine will get one one-hundred and eighth each, seven will get one one two hundred and seventieth each, and the remaining seven will get one three hundred and seventy-eighth each.

A Comprehensive Monument.

After considerable hesitation, which must have been justified, the park commissioners of Philadelphia have accepted the $500,000 bequest of Richard Smith for a memorial to himself in Fairmount park. The estimable Mr. Smith gains this distinction by the scope of his memorial, which is to be adorned with statues of McClellan, Hancock, Meade and Reynolds, and bronze busts of other famous Pennsylvanians—Andrew G. Curtin, General Hartranft, David D. Porter, John A. Dahlgren, General Beaver, General Crawford—to whom are added John B. Gest, executor of the estate, and James H. Windrim, architect of the memorial. The inscription "Richard Smith, type founder, of Philadelphia," is to be placed on the main column and a statue of Mr. Smith is to be placed at the right of the entrance. It will be a curious thing.

Animated Stones.

Now that the curious and eccentric "jumping bean" has had its run it will next be in order for someone to make an expedition into the desert region of Southwest Nevada and collect a carload of "animated" or "moving" stones, long since acknowledged as being the greatest geological curiosities in the world. They are described as being almost perfectly round, the majority of them as large as a walnut and of the color, texture and hardiness of nodules of kidney iron ore. When distributed about the floor, table or other level surface, and within two or three feet of each other, they immediately begin moving towards a common center and never cease their curious traveling operations until all gather around the largest stone and lie huddled together like eggs in a nest. On the desert of Nevada they are found most frequently in that portion that is comparatively level, the surface being composed of bare, stratified rocks. Scattered over this barren and rocky region are numerous little basins, from a few inches to a rod or two in diameter, and in these the "animated stones" are usually found. The stones themselves average about as noted above, but they are found in all sizes, from that of a bird up to six or seven inches in diameter. The cause of the peculiar animated actions of these stones is doubtless to be found in the material of which they are composed, which appear to be "lodestone," or magnetic iron ore.

In the Australian desert similar geological oddities are found. There they are called "traveling stones."—St. Louis Republic.

Pathos in Congress.

A very conspicuous and absurdly sentimental member of the House from New England, who loves to weep over the wickedness of the world, and was pathetic over pensions, gave utterance to this burst of eloquence when the pension appropriation bill was under consideration by the House:

'Why did he weep? Why did he weep? I say, Mr. Speaker, why did he weep? I repeat, Mr. Speaker, why did he weep? His heart was broken. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I knew this man. He died of a broken heart! He died of a broken heart. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, he died of a broken heart! He never smiled again. They refused him the pitiful increase of $2 a month on his pension. I say, Mr. Speaker, he never smiled again. I repeat, he never smiled again!' and there were tears in the member's voice as he closed this outburst of pathos.—Philadelphia Telegraph.

Banking in Russia.

In Russia the State bank advances money at 4½ per cent. a year on all kinds of goods in amounts as high as two-thirds of their value. It takes money on deposit at 1½ per cent. A little while ago, to assist the grain trade, the government bought largely direct from the producers, and will soon be the largest holder of grain in the country. It has nearly completed the absorption of private railroad lines, has acquired the monopoly of the manufacture of spirits and the control of the retail trade, is about to take the wine and sugar trade into its hands, and very likely the coal trade as well.

Hoax—My wife and some of her friends are going to organize a secret society. Joax—Nonsense! The idea of women in a secret society. Hoax—You misunderstand. They are to meet to tell secrets.—Philadelphia Record.

Luck evens itself up in the long run. If you want a good servant girl, go to a milliner.

On the Threshold.

The ancient simile of "going through a man with a lantern" bids fair to become a daily reality, by means of the cathode ray. Soldiers in the war time were accustomed to speak of army surgeons, who held up their emaciated patients between their medical eyes and the sun to discover the nature of their internal disabilities. This practice will be superseded by use of the cathode ray and the sensitized plate. Bullets, splinters, and other foreign substances lurking in the human body may be readily discovered and dragged from their concealment. These doses of poison may be discovered in the original packages in which they were swallowed. The system of the boodler may be pierced, as it were, by the ray and it may be discovered what it is he is holding so tightly clenched in his hand behind his back. We stand on the threshold of great discoveries in regard to that mystery of mysteries—the human heart—and may hope to learn something definite concerning the caprices of the liver, while the powerful ray penetrating the thick walls of the skull will reveal the nature of the substance which, in the "top pieces" of many of our statesmen, answers the purpose of brains.—Kansas City Star.

Our Lake Commerce.

The commerce of the great lakes is rapidly exceeding the American commerce on the ocean. The number of vessels now contracted for or building for 1896 is sixty-five, with a valuation of $8,549,000. Of these forty-two are freight boats, with a capacity of 136,600 gross tons. The coast ship building for the year will be only 105 vessels, with a total valuation of $6,040,400, and most of these are passenger and pleasure boats. In the river yards twenty-four vessels are being constructed, to cost $537,650. The largest vessel planned in the coast yards is 280 feet long, while the smallest of the lake freighters is 326 feet in length. The figures, of course, do not include the work in the navy yards. It is evident that the great lakes are to furnish the traffic route of the future from the interior, and with a ship canal to the Atlantic coast, which must eventually be constructed, the next generation will see their waters covered by a fleet whose numbers are beyond the reach of imagination at present.

A Drinking Dog.

A dog in Louisville loafs in a saloon on Newspaper row and is a drunkard. The dog is only a common cur, but he likes his toddy and must have it every day. Not a day passes that the dog does not get drunk, and after getting full he staggers behind the stove and sleeps it off. The dog is 12 years old and has made his home around the saloon in question for the last nine years. He never attempts to bite anyone, and all who frequent the saloon think a great deal of the dog. Often men will visit the saloon just for the purpose of seeing the dog and getting him drunk. His liquor is given him in a saucer and he likes it like many a man.

An Electric Hen.

An electric hen has recently been invented, which is claimed to be superior to the natural article of flesh, feathers and blood, except that it cannot lay eggs. When the electric incubator has produced the chickens, an electric foster mother takes them in charge. The upper part is devoted to the freshly hatched, while the lower part is so arranged that the young can run around on the ground and at the same time find heat and protection when they require it.

An Idle Scavenger.

The bowels act the part of a scavenger, inasmuch as they remove much of the debris, the waste effete matter of the system. When they grow idle, neglectful of duty, it is of the utmost importance that they should be impelled to activity. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters effects this desirable object without griping them like a drastic purgative. The Bitters is also efficacious for malaria, bilious, dyspeptic and kidney trouble.

The Largest Bottle.

The largest bottle in the world is 115 feet high. Two enormous doors give access to the ground floor, which is a refreshment room, staircases in the inside lead to the bottle's neck, where there is a terrace which holds nearly forty people. The cork is kiosque.

Everybody Can Ride.

It is estimated that 2,000,000 bicycles will be sold in 1896, at an average cost of $60 per wheel, which amounts to $120,000,000, and yet some people say that it is a fad and will soon disappear.

A Great Investment.

The Gold Stock Trading Co., of 35 and 37 Broadway, New York, have just declared a monthly bonus of 15 per cent. in addition to the regular dividends of 20 per cent. This is a remarkable showing. The company trades in Gold Mining and other shares and have reliable inside information on these securities. Some of their stocks have advanced from 600 to 1800 per cent. in value and others are in line for large advances. Investments are accepted of $20 to $1,000 and certificates are issued for the amount with 8 dividend coupons attached like a United States bond. The New York Financial Record, of March 18, one of the leading monetary organs of the United States, speaking of this company says: "The conservative management and high character of the directorate invite the cordial support of all investors desiring safe and large returns for small capital." With this endorsement our readers will do well to correspond with the Company and obtain their prospectus and further particulars with a view to profitable business.

It has been computed that a fog costs the city of London from £50,000 to £100,000 a day. A large proportion of this is borne by the railroad companies.

Mothers

Anxiously watch declining health of their daughters. So many are cut off by consumption in early years that there is real cause for anxiety. In the early stages, when not beyond the reach of medicine, Hood's Sarsaparilla will restore the quality and quantity of the blood and thus give good health. Read the following letter:

"It is but just to write about my daughter Cora, aged 19. She was completely run down, declining, had that tired feeling, and friends said she would not live over three months. She had a bad and nothing seemed to do her any good. I happened to read about Hood's Sarsaparilla and had her give it a trial. From the very first dose she began to get better. After taking a few bottles she was completely cured and her health has been the best ever since." MRS. ADDIE PECK, 12 Railroad Place, Amsterdam, N. Y.

Good Glue.

To make glue for resisting fire, proceed as follows: Mix a handful of quicklime in four ounces of linseed oil; boil to a good thickness, then spread on plates in the shade, an it will become exceeding hard, but may be easily dissolved over the fire, and used as ordinary glue. It resists fire after having been used for glueing substances together.

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills, which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge, that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, laxatives or other remedies are then not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

RIPANS TABULES

Mr. Xeno W. Putnam, a literary man and a student of advertising, residing at Harmonsburg, Pa., under date of June 3, 1895, writes as follows: "Not long since I came upon a 'Knight of the Road' taking something from a small vial, a circumstance that I would hardly have noticed had not my eye fallen upon the well-known Ripans label. Then I was interested, and proceeded to interview him. 'What do I take 'em fur?' he answered my query. 'See here, young fellow, what do ye take yer swag fur? Fun, ain't it? Yer see, when a fellow's liver and stomach is out er whack jher ain't much fun in my biz; so I gets these here pills and then I have fun. A fellow can have lots o' fun trampin' if 'is stomach's in good order. So that's what I takes 'em fur; just fun. Where do I live? Usually about where I happen ter be. Yer see, I live there because I hain't happened ter die there yet, thanks ter these little fellows,' holding up the vial. Partly in a spirit of jest I told him it might be considerably to his advantage to give some address where he might be reached. 'I don't take no advantages,' he answered sagely, 'I just take these 'er pills an' travel.' The circumstance was so unique that I decided to report it to you."

Ripans Tabules are sold by druggists, or by mail if the price (50 cents a box) is sent to The Ripans Chemical Company, No. 10 Spruce Street, New York. Sample vial, 10 cents.

Coinage.

There are still a few democratic papers wild enough to claim that free silver is the salvation of the country and the cure of all ills the body politic is heir to. If these extremists could be silenced, there would be a fighting chance for democracy this year. But they evidently prefer the course that their own judgment must teach them, leads to defeat. We have tried time and again to make it plain to our readers the greatest thing about this silver and gold question was its ability to keep democratic success in the distance. It is merely a good thing to quarrel about, but in fact amounts to merely nothing to the common people. The wealthy gold men may make money in gold transactions; the wealthy silver men may get richer by dealing in silver, But for the common people, the people who do the quarreling, who spend day after day disputing about the two metals—there is not a penny in it. No matter which party is in power, silver and gold and paper money will be made and used right along, as has been done ever since silver was "demonetized in 1873.' Under "free coinage" we made 8 million silver dollars in the 80 years previous to 1873. Since silver was "demonetised," we have coined about 400 millions of silver. If demonetization increased the coinage of silver at this rate, it don't seem such a great crime after all. Democrats are in favor of both gold and silver and it is extremely silly to quarrel about it.

For Young People.

Very few papers for "Young Folks" are an advantage for young folks to read. We received yesterday a copy of the "Star" a paper "for young folks" as its title reads. It is in the interest of a new order called, the "Coming Men of America." It claims also to be good and worthy, and that its perusal will do young people a service. As an example of the kind of truck they are using to do young people good we clip a fragment, that our eye chanced on by accident, in the middle of a long article. Here it is:

"The boys had formed a silent circle and were all agape.

Bob led with his right and landed on Henry's shoulder. Henry returned with his right and was neatly stopped, receiving at the same time a smart left hander in the chest.

This was not the whole of his punishment either, for Bob saw that Henry was a novice at the manly art of self-defense, and concluded he had an easy conquest.

But when he got a smashing swing in a dangerous spot under his left ear, he realized that whatever the other lacked in science he fully made up in strength.

The battle went on, the combatants moved this way and that, Henry Dalton getting considerably the worst of the punishment, but taking it like a man.

Suddenly his right shot out straight as an arrow for Bob's chin, breaking down the latter's guard and landing him flat on his back."

Now, if some kind reader will tell us what there is in such truck as this, to "elevate the minds and morals of our young people" we shall be greatly obliged.

The World's Fair Tests showed no baking powder so pure or so great in leavening power as the Royal.

Pearls.

Those who saw the lovely pearl from the Wiconsin creeks, that were exhibited at the World's fair, will feel an interest in this item.

Pearls are found in all waters where oysters or mussels abound. They have been discovered in the shells of the common mussels in many rivers in the United States The most extensive pearl fisheries, however, are those in the Red sea, in the Persian gulf and in the Indian ocean, off the island of Ceylon. The product of the Red sea and Persian gulf does not cut any considerable figure in the world's supply, which comes mainly from Ceylon and the Indian coast, where the pearl diving is a regular business with thousands of men.

Seed time

The successful farmer has learned by experience that some grains require far different soil than others. He knows that a great deal depends on right planting at the right time. No use complaining in summer that a mistake was made in spring. Decide before seed-time. The best time to treat coughs and colds is before the seeds or germs, of consumption have begun their destructive work.

Scott's Emulsion of Cod-liver Oil, with Hypophosphites, promptly cures lung and throat troubles. Do not neglect your cold.

An Honest Man's Story.

GREENVILLAGE, PA., Jan., 22, '96

DEAR SIR: — Thank God there is a medicine that will cure catarrh. Mr. Pretzinger, I used your sample box of catarrah which you sent me. The first night I used it, it helped me. May God bless you for your kindness. I used the little box you sent me and about half of a 50c. jar. They keep it in Chambersburg. I have told a great many people about your medicine. Hon. 'Squire Britton, brother in-law to me, is using it; he says it is helping him very much; he has catarrh very bad. Mrs. G. D. Ludwig, daughter of me, is using your medicine. I use it in the evening before retiring to bed and am feeling better now than I have for the last five years. My head is clear and I have more energy for work and business. Before I used your medicine I felt many a time that I did not care whether I live or not; I had no energy; I did not care for anything. I had catarrh over sixty seven years; mother had catarrh and it turned into consumption; she died in her sixty fourth year. I have a farm up at Strasburg, seven miles from Greenvillage. On nice days I drive up to the farm and work. Mr. Pretzinger I think it would pay you to have it put in all the Franklin County papers as I am a reliable, honest man, so the people say, middling well acquainted over the Co.

Yours truly,
GEO. K. ZOLLINGER.

A sample can be obtained by sending a 2c. stamp to Pretzinger Bros., Chemists Dayton, Ohio.

The Caucus

The democratic township caucus was held as announced, at the band room in the Gandy Block Saturday evening. But few were present from the country as a thunder shower had been pouring since about six o'clock. But there was a good attendance from town. The meeting was called to order by John Picker, one of the committemen, and C. M. Brown was made chairman and John C. Lochner secretary. The latter read the call, and then the meeting proceeded to elect the delegates. The selection was by ballot, and in several cases there were three or four votes taken. Some, however, were elected by acclamation. The list will be found below under the proper head. Before adjournment, the question of holding a primary election to nominate candidates for city officers came up, and while no action could be taken by this meeting, it was the almost universal sentiment, that the usual caucus plan would be better at present, rather than to try any new experiment. We presume that the town caucus will feel the same way. The meeting was very harmonious. Below, we give such delegates as have been reported.

UNION TOWNSHIP.

The congressional delegates are: R. S. S. Reed, H. H. Cupp, John Robbins, Geo. Link and G. W. Morr.

The sentorial delegates are: Fred. Kruger, Fred. Shaffer, John Picker, Phil. Myers and John Harris. In each case, delegates are to select their alternates in case they cannot go to the convention.

WILMINGTON.

Congressional: A. N. Aldrich, M. E. Gardner, John H. Krontz, W. A. Daniels.

Senatorial: W. L. Blair, D. Tomlinson, H. D. Tomlinson and George Hallett.

CONCORD.

Congressional: T. S. Murray and Will Curie, with Chris Curie and J. C. Hull alternates.

Sentoral: Frank Barney and S. S. Shutt, with Eli Beams and F. A. Jenkins, altegnates.

The committeemen for Concord are: John Moody, Spencerville, and F. A. Jenkins and Wm. Curie St. Joe.

KEYSER

Congressional: Joseph Recklenwald, Geo. Metzer, Geo. Cattell, L. J. Gengler, E. A. Myers, J. J. Schriner; alternates, C. Hyke, L. Sapp, Elias Fisher, Wm. Marten, J. W. Behler, Fred Groscop.

Senatonal: Chas. Rugman, Frank Kircher, James Kelham, Ed. Van Fleit, E. B. Thumma, W. J. Frederick; alternates, J. D. Williams, H. H. Houser, Theo. Cattell, Joseph Strouse, J. I. Smith, E. P. Fitzgerald.

Old People.

Old people who require medicine to regulate the bowels and kidneys will find the true remedy in Electric Bitters. This medicine does not stimulate and contains no whisky nor other intoxicant but acts as a tonic and alterative. It acts mild on the stomach and bowels, adding strength and giving tone to the organs thereby aiding Nature in the performance of the functions. Electric Bitters is an excellent appetizer and aids digestion. Old People find it just exactly what they need. Price 50c a bottle at Robbins & McCord's Drug Store. 5

COURT

Monday's Daily.

Court started up this morning. The first item we find, is the special jury to sit on the railroad case that comes up from Allen Co. It is the case of McCormick & Ott vs the Wabash road, to get pay for a race horse that was killed in a wreck last year. The jury was drawn by jury commissioners Wilson and Boland. Their names are John H. Elson, John Wilson, Phineas Childs, Henry Rempis, Solomon Deetz, Perry Foote, Wm. Kenedy, Norman Jackman Simon Rohm, Bert Campbell, J. Wingard, Wm. Snyder, Henry Sebert, G. Showers, Shiply Wilson; Geo. Wittig, sixteen in all.

Judge Adair came over from Columbia City to-day to try some cases in which Judge Penfield had been attorney. They are working at the Humbarger case this afternoon.

Two Lives Saved.

Mrs. Phoebe Thomas, of Junction City Ill., was told by her doctors she had consumption and that there was no hope for her, but two bottles of Dr. King's New Discovery completely cured her and she says it saved her life. Mr. Thomas Eggers, 139 Florida St., San Francisco, suffered from a dreadful cold, approaching consumption. He tried without result, everything else, then he bought one bottle of Dr. King's New Discovery and in two weeks was cured. He is naturally thankful. It is such results, of which these are samples, that prove the wonderful efficacy of this medicine in coughs and colds. Free trial bottles at Robbins & McCord's drugstore. Regular size 50 cents and $1. 5

THE HABITS OF CHILDREN

Should be closely watched and regulated by mothers. Carelessness in childhood often leads to serious troubles in after life. The digestive organs and bowels should be kept in the best possible condition to insure good health, not only for the present, but for years to come. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, a harmless but potent remedy, corrects all such evils in children. Twenty doses [for children] 10c. at Davenport the Druggist. 14-18

O, Y- Blind!

If you could select the pure gold from the dross, the wheat from the chaff, the good from the bad, you would never make the mistake of taking any other remedy than Foley's Sarsaparilla for blood disorders. Trial size, 50c.

A TURE SAYING

It has been said that habitual constipation is the cause of fully one-half the diseases that flesh is heir to. Keep your bowels regulated by Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, and your system will be in proper condition to keep off diseases of all kinds. Get a sample bottle (10 doses 10 cents) of Davenport the Druggist, and you will bless the day you did. 14-18

A Year Without a Summer

Almost every one has heard tell of the terrible dark year in the early part of the present century, which old New England farmers refer to as "eighteen hundred and starved to death." A contributor gives the following information:

While every one is speaking of the present season as being remarkable in its characteristics, I have gathered for your readers some reliable facts of the year 1816, known as the "year without a summer." Few persons now living can recollect it; but it was the coldest ever known throughout Europe and America. The following is a brief abstract of the weather during the year:

January was mild—so much so as to render fires almost needless in parlors. December previous was very cold.

February was not very cold; with the exception of a few days it was mild, like its predecessor.

March was cold and boisterous during the first part of it; the remainder was mild. A great freshet on the Ohio and Kentucky rivers caused great loss of property.

April began warm, but grew colder as the month advanced, and ended in snow and ice, with a temperature more like winter than spring.

May was more remarkable for frowns than smiles. Buds and flowers were frozen, ice formed half an inch thick; corn was killed, and the fields were again and again planted until deemed too late.

June was the coldest ever known in this latitude. Frost, ice and snow were common. Almost every green thing was killed. Fruit was nearly all destroyed. Snow fell to the depth of ten inches in Vermont, several in Maine and three in central New York, and also in Massachusetts. Considerable damage was done at New Orleans in consequence of the rapid rise in the river; the suburbs were only passable in boats.

July was accompanied by frost and ice. On the 5th, ice was formed of the thickndss of common window-glass, throughout New England, New York and some parts of Pennsylvania. Indian corn was nearly all destroyed; some favorably situated fields escaped. This was true of some of the hill farms of Massachusetts.

August was more cheerless if possible than the summer months already passed. Ice was formed half an inch thick. Indian corn was so frozen that the greater part was cut down and dried for fodder. Almost every green thing was destroyed both in this country and Europe. Papers from England stated that it would be remembered by the present generation that the year 1816 was a year in which there was no summer. Very little corn ripened in New England and the Middle States. Farmers supplied themselves from the corn produced in 1815 for the seed of the spring of 1817. It sold at from $4 to $5 per bushel.

September furnished about two weeks of the mildest weather of the season. Soon after the middle it became very cold and frosty, and ice formed a quarter of an inch thick.

October produced more than its share of cold weather; frost and ice particularly.

November was cold and blustering. Enough snow fell to make good sleighing.

December was quite mild and comfortable.

The above is a brief summary of "the cold summer of 1816," as it was called, in order to distinguish it from the cold season. The winter was mild. Frost and ice were common in every month of the year. Very little vegetation matured in the Eastern and Middle States. The sun's rays seemed to be destitute of heat through the entire summer; all nature seemed to be clad in a sable hue, and men exhibited no little anxiety concerning the future of this life.

The average wholesale price of flour during that year, in the Philadelphia market, was thirteen dollars per barrel. The average price of wheat in England was ninety-seven snillings per quarter.

Heart Disease Cured

By Dr. Miles' Heart Cure.

Fainting, Weak or Hungry Spells, Irregular or Intermittent Pulse, Fluttering or Palpitation, Choking Sensation, Shortness of Breath, Swelling of Feet and Ankles, are symptoms of a diseased or Weak Heart.

MRS. N. C. MILLER.

Of Fort Wayne, Ind., writes on Nov. 29, 1894: "I was afflicted for forty years with heart trouble and suffered untold agony. I had weak, hungry spells, and my heart would palpitate so hard, the pain would be so acute and torturing, that I became so weak and nervous I could not sleep. I was treated by several physicians without relief and gave up ever being well again. About two years ago I commenced using Dr. Miles' Remedies. One bottle of the Heart Cure stopped all heart troubles and the Restorative Nervine did the rest, and now I sleep soundly and attend to my household and social duties without any trouble.

SPROTT & CO

COURT.

As noted Monday, Judge Adair, of Columbia City began that day as special judge. In some cases that Judge Penfield could not sit on, for the reason that he he had been counsel in them. After a hearing of the Humbarger case, there was some time spent in "making up issues" etc, and Tuesday, work began on the case between Gaskell and Dr. Keller, which originally was tried here on a change of venue from Allen county.

Readers of the Weekly may remember that we reported this case pretty fully at that time. Dr. Keller is a manufacturer of dental instruments at Fort Wayne, and a lad named Gaskell was working for him. By an accident Gaskell was hurt by one of the machines and it was claimed, the accident was caused by some defect. Keller claimed that the boy had been told to be careful and handle this machine properly, but had failed to obey. But the suit was brought for damages which Gaskell claimed he had sustained. After a hard-fought trial, it was decided that Gaskell should have $2600 damages. Keller thought this so exorbitant for the amount of injury done, that he appealed it to the supreme court. Now, it has been sent back to the circuit court to be tried over again. As near as we can see, the main fight is now to reduce the amount of damages to a fair size. The jury has it in hand, and there seems to be more work for the attorneys and the judge than for witnesses. Keller's attorneys are Swayne, of Fort Wayne and Judge McClellan, of Auburn. For Gaskell, are Harris, of Fort Wayne, and Roby of Angola. The trial seems to be drawing to a close to-day. Dr. Keller and wife are both present. Mrs Keller has many warm friends among Auburn ladies.

Quite a number of other cases have come up since our last report. The case between Widney & Bearss against George Culbertson came up again but has been closed out and dismissed, the costs being also paid. It was a dispute over the sale of some fruit trees.

Cora vs Charles W. Walker, resulted in a divorce and she gets $500 alimony and is allowed $25 for attorney's free, resumes her maiden name of Keller.

B. F. Wallick vs Wm Wallick to appoint guardian., Lewis Pipher was appointed and gave $1000 bonds.

The case of Crouse vs Pynchon, on note, plaintiff gets $250. The real estate improvement Co. of Baltimore vs Cross, on mortgage, J. E. Rose for plaintiffs, gets them $388.

The Humbarger case is probably about over with. When it came up, it appeared that they could do nothing with it yet, as it was not yet out of the supreme court, the sixty days the latter court had to consider it, not having yet expired.

PROBATE DOCKET.

J. E. Thompson as guardian of the minor heirs of A. P. Benjamin filed additional bond. with H. K. Leas and Ida A. Bingham as sureties.

Talma Rummel filed a final report as guardian of G. C. Everts heirs and was discharged.

Daniel Kimmel, appointed guardian of John Green's heir, with J. W. Smathers and Edwin Mortorff on a $3,000 bond.

Wm. Goodwin guardian for Henry A. Goodwin, non comp., continued two years.

Mary A. King, guardian Bertha Kings also reported and was continued two years.

Geo W. Kirkpatrick, guardian of Bertha Kirkpatrick filed additional bond.

Adam Koelein, guardian of Catharine Koelein, ordered to give additional bond within five days.

Reuben Sawvel, had been appointed guardian of Bessie Lewis, heir of Belle Lewis, deceased, but resigned, and it is ordered that the clerk of Steuben county appoint another.

Ab. Kelley, administrator of Martin Look estate reported, "nothing to administer on" and was discharged. The same was done in case of R. J. Fisk, administrator of the John D. Porter estate.

Ida E. Clark's bond was approved as administrator of the estate of H. F. Clark.

O. C. Clark, administrator of Adelheit Wartensleben made report and was continued one year.

Jacob Grimm, administrator of Mary Brown estate, files petition to sell personal property at private sale. Granted. The same entry is made in Israel Ringler estate.

L. J. Gengler was appointed administrator of the estate of Bell Bibb.

Bond approved of James Carnahan for the Wm McKinley estate; same for Geo. L. Lanning in the Amanda Benninghoff estate.

Emma Knott, administrator of the estate of Samuel M. Knott, sale of land reported, approved and deed ordered made.

W. H. Leas, executor of estate of Sophia Baird reported sale of real estate and report was approved and deed ordered.

Mary E. Smith vs the N. Benninghoff estate, claim $200, was settled, by agreement, John Beams is administrator.

Frank A. Brink was allowed $10 out of the estate of James Draggoo.

W. F. Shumaker, M. D. allowed $50 of Anna M. Mason est.

Geo. W. Kimes was allowed $8 out of the Nathan Benninghoff estate.

D. D. Diehl was allowed $1142.91 out of the Susannah Diehl estate. I. M. Diehl was allowed $3075, and J. F. Repp $9.65 in the same.

Velera Haines allowed, $50 in the A. Spurgeon estate.

Geo. A. Mark, administratrix of the estate of Jacob Mark reports sale of realty. Deed ordered and approved.

Wm. Seeley, administrator of the Sarah Losure estate asked leave to mortgage the land. Granted. B. F. Blair and Geo. Benninghoff are sureties.

Saturday's Daily.

The hard-fought damage suit between Gaskell and Keller ended this forenoon. The jury had been out all night and had to answer over 100 interrogatories, beside the difficult one of fixing the amount of damages. They decided that $2450 was a proper amount reaching this decision only after a great many ballots. When first polled the amounts though proper by the different jurymen ranged from $1,500 to $4,000. Then came the struggle to get together. At times they were within a hundred or two, and then hang at that. Then it would be different. But this morning they had averaged it up and were ready at 9 o'clock when court was called. As it is the second time it has been tried here, it attracted a good deal of attention. Of course there are different opinions as to the verdict. There always is, over a hard-fought case, and though the present verdict is $150 less than at the other trial there are many who think it still too high. But the jury is at least up to the average in point of intelligence and it will be of benefit to no one to criticise their judgment. We presume the case will be again appealed to the supreme court.

Robbers Here.

Three of the Men Now In The County Jail.

Thursday's Daily.

Sheriff Stroh and deputy Neal Platter brought the three robbers who were wounded over from Garrett today and placed them in jail. Marshal West also arrested two fellows here this forenoon on suspicion and they were put in the calaboose. They were in Hank West's saloon and asked for a Garrett paper. Hank was not in possession of that rotten sheet, the Clipper, and they then asked for the DAILY COURIER. Mr. West furnished them the paper and they looked it over for the writeup of the robbery. They laughed at the article about "Free Beer" and as Hank approached them they turned the paper to him. He said nothing but went out after John and he locked them up.

The robbers who were locked up here to-day, are probably tramps, as Sheriff Stroh and many others saw a part of them in Auburn, and they had been hanging around Garrett. They had been hanging around Garrett. They got on the train at Garrett, between the baggage and express cars, to steal a ride. The man they attacked was on his way home from Pittsburg to Chicago, and when they stopped at Garrett he got off and looked at the engine. Then as the train started, he jumped on the steps, not noticing but what he was at the right car. He found six men there. They at once objected to his staying there, but he could not get away as the train was going. They then caught him, and robbed him, and after kicking and striking him, pitched him out headlong a little west of Altona. It is a wonder he was not killed. He regained consciousness and walked to Garrett, gave the alarm, and a message was sent to Bremen to have the men arrested when it reached there. This was done by the marshal there with several assistants. But when about half way up street, one of the prisoners struck his guard and broke away. Both parties opened fire, but no one was hit till a Geman veteran came out with his old army rifle, when he hit the first time, shooting his man through the body and the right hand He and two others were arrested and brought to Garrett and kept till to-day noon, when the sheriff brought over two of them, Charles Reynolds and John Moore. L. J. Gaylor and Neal Platter brought over the wounded man Joseph Gayler, in a buggy All are in jail to wait for a trial. Three are out yet, though only five were on the train at Bremen.

Friday's Daily.

The robbers who were arrested at Bremen and are now here in jail ere evidently a tough lot. The fight they made at Bremen and the way they made it, proves this. They were well armed, and it is believed they would have robbed the train, at some of the lonely places in the barren woods this of Chicago. One thing that gives color to this belief, is that the wounded man, Gaylor, had on his person a good sized package of giant powder. We are told that this package was not discovered at the time he was captured at Bremen, but after his arrival at Garrett. It is possible they had this powder, to blow open the safe in case they could hold up the train.

How Is It Possible?

You can't see how mince meat, as good as any made at home, can be sold for 10 cents a package (enough for 2 large pies)?

New Woman.

In Michigan, the women may vote on school matters and be school officers. A late dispatch brings word that at the village of Marcellus, in Cass county, which is run exclusively by women, is in the throes of a war between the new women and the old men over the action of the woman's school board, which removed Professor Schoelzaur, the principal of the schools. Since coming into power the women have been running things with a high hand, much to the disgust of the men, who are engaged now in holding indignation meetings.

Business Change.

A very imoprtant business change took, place yesterday, W. R. Hidy who has for the past four years conducted the popular "Home Restaurant" sold it to Baxter Brothers, Miles and George. Mr. Hidy has made his business a marked success and has secured the good will of the entire community. We do not know as to his future location or business, but our people will always have a friendly interest in his success. He has made a friend of all who had dealings with him. The two young men who succeed him, are well known to all our people, and though they may not have much experience in conducting a restaurant, we believe they will succeed. George has been employed by Mr. Hidy as an assistant for some time, and has in that way familiarized himself with much of the details, and the good judgment which we believe both have, will make them a success in their present venture. The grocery in connection with the restaurant has always been well patronized, and we presume they will keep it up to its usual high standard. The COURIER has only good words for the old and the new managers.

CASTORIA

for Infants and Children.

MOTHERS, Do You Know that Paregoric, Bateman's Drops, Godfrey's Cordial, many so-called Soothing Syrups, and most remedies for children are composed of opium or morphine?

Do You Know that opium and morphine are stupefying narcotic poisons?

Do You Know that in most countries druggists are not permitted to sell narcotics without labeling them poisons?

Do You Know that you should not permit any medicine to be given your child unless you or your physician know of what it is composed?

Do You Know that Castoria is a purely vegetable preparation, and that a list of its ingredients is published with every bottle?

Do You Know that Castoria is the prescription of the famous Dr. Samuel Pitcher. That it has been in use for nearly thirty years, and that more Castoria is now sold than of all other remedies for children combined?

Do You Know that the Patent Office Department of the United States, and of other countries, have issued exclusive right to Dr. Pitcher and his assigns to use the word "Castoria" and its formula, and that to imitate them is a state prison offense?

Do You Know that one of the reasons for granting this government protection was because Castoria had been proven to be absolutely harmless?

Do You Know that 35 average doses of Castoria are furnished for 35 cents, or one cent a dose?

Do You Know that when possessed of this perfect preparation, your children may be kept well, and that you may have unbroken rest?

Well, these things are worth knowing. They are facts.

The fac-simile signature of Chas. H. Fletcher is on every wrapper.

AROUND THE WORLD.

INTELLIGENCE FROM ALL PARTS OF THE GLOBE.

News from Foreign Shores—Domestic Happenings—Personal Pointers—Labor Notes—Political Occurrences—Fires, Accidents Crimes, Etc.

Prevented a Wreck on the B. & O.

Mrs Freeman, living a few miles east of Shoals, Ind., prevented a wreck by her thoughtfulness and probably saved several lives. It was just growing dark when Mrs. Freeman observed a bridge of the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern ablaze and was so badly burned that it would probably not hold the weight of a train. In the distance she heard the approach of a westbound freight train and ran as far towards it as she could loosening her petticoat as she ran. When the train came in sight she waved the undergarment violently across the track. The train was a long one. It was stopped within seventy-five feet of the bridge, which was found to be in a very unsafe condition. The trainmen have begun a movement to raise a purse for Mrs. Freeman.

State of Trade.

R. G. Dun & Co.'s Weekly Review of Trade says: "The improvement expected with spring weather begins, though in some branches of business scarcely visible. As consumers make spring purchases they must lessen stock and compel less buying. The stocks taken in advance of consumer's demands last summer have been distributed far more slowly than was expected, but months of waiting have helped to lessen the load which it is hoped spring buying will clear away. Apprehensions of foreign or financial difficulties have hindered, but are now scarcely felt. Gold exports are rumored, but at this season are so far natural that they have no such power to cause alarm as they had in winter.

Counterfeiters' Cave Found.

On an island in the St. Joseph River, between Bristol, Ind., and Mottville, Mich., a cave has been discovered which has been used by counterfeiters. There are several chambers or apartments in the cave all well supplied with apparatus for the manufacture of counterfeit money. Coin of several denominations in all stages of manufacture have been brought to light. The discovery was made by section men on the railroad finding a wire which undoubtedly was used as a signal wire by the counterfeiters. United States officials are now investigating.

Explorers Drowned.

Crookston (Minn.) special: Letters received from Rainy River, on the Canadian boundary, report the death on Rainy River of Colonel A. R. Naff, a United States Deputy Marshal and their entire party of explorers, in all probably eight men. They were on their way to investigate reports of the timber stealing by Canadians along the boundary and tributary waters, and were ascending the Rainy by sleighs. They are reported to have broken through the ice and to have been lost.

Canteen Saloon.

Fort Robinson (Neb.) special: The complaint of Crawford citizens that the government has no right to sell liquor without state restrictions at the fort has resulted in the post canteen being closed pending advices from the Secretary of War. This is considered singular, since the government is granted complete authority on all United States lands in Nebraska. This question involves all United States property in all States.

Another Shortage.

Another shortage amounting to $80,000 has been discovered by the committee auditing the books of ex-City Attorney Moreland of Pittsburgh. The total shortage now aggregates considerable more than $100,000. Moreland and his assistant, House, are now out on bail pending trial for misappropriation of public funds.

Killed in the Ring.

The Bermuda Released.

A private dispatch has been received in London announcing the release of the steamship Bermuda at Puerto Cortez. Ninety boxes of ammunition found aboard of her and which were sized are held by the Hondurian authorities.

The Boiler Burst.

By a boiler explosion at the coal mines of the Etna Company, at Whiteside, Tenn. Joe Anderson, a young white man, unmarried, was instantly killed. Robert Alexander, colored, the engineer, was seriously scalded.

Attempt to Murder His Mother.

Hayden Armstrong, who resides with his mother, Catherine Armstrong, 10 miles north of Shelbyville, Ind., became suddently and violently insane, and attempted to murder his mother with an ax. The mother was chased over the premises, and fell exhausted just as a neighbor caught the son and disarmed him. Mrs. Armstrong is in a critical condition.

Gen. Weyler Wants More Troops.

Madrid special: A dispatch from Havana to the Imparcial says there is reason to believe that Captain General Weyler has asked for 40,000 more troops and that Senor De Azcarraga, minister of war, has approved the requisition.

FEARFUL PLUNGE.

Two Coaches Go Over an Embankment Near Freeport, Pa.

The Butler express on the West Pennsylvania Railway was wrecked near Freeport, Penn., and five persons were seriously injured. There names are:

J. E. McKelvy, Butler, Penn., hurt internally, will probably die.

W. H. Walker, Butler, Penn., hurt internally.

C. J. McCafferty, Summersville.

W. M. Gray, brakeman.

William Murphy, Butler.

The last three were cut about the face and hands and are believed to be internally injured.

The accident was caused by the rails spreading. The two rear coaches jumped the track and went over an embankment. Fire broke out almost immediately and the passengers narrowly escaped with their lives. Fortunately the front car, which was filled with passengers, did not leave the track.

SUFFOCATED.

Ten Sleeping Tenants Awake in Eternity at Brooklyn.

Ten persons perished by suffocation in a tenement house at Brooklyn, N. Y. All met their death by suffocation. The bodies of some of them were badly burned.

The fire started in the lower hallway of the building, which is a four story tenement in Union street, and before the sleeping tenants could be warned of their danger all escape was cut off. The flames swept up the stairways and halls and rooms were quickly filled with smoke. Ten of the tenants were suffocated in their beds.

The section of the city where this terrible disaster occurred is near the water front. The majority of the residents are Italians of the poorer classes, and they form the biggest colony of their race in Brooklyn.

The firemen succeeded in getting the fire under control in a short time. The damage to the building is estimated at $4,000.

Spanish Atrocities.

A special from Havana, via Tampa, Fla., says: Jose Ramon Del Valle, a Spaniard, who has been alcalde for some time of the important town of Jovellanos, province of Havana, has resigned his position and brought his family here. He sails for Mexico immediately. He states as a reason that he can no longer stand the excesses committed by Spanish troops. Senor Del Valle is a man of culture and intelligence and has no leaning towards the insurgents. His testimony is therefore unbiased. He says Spanish troops are killing innocent people right and left. The people of Havana have no idea what atrocities are being committed. In many parts of the island the troops pillage stores, residences, and estates and kill unarmed men. Unquestionably they are more to be feared than the insurgents.

Cloudburst Floods Clay County, Ky.

Bonville (Ky.) special: D. L. Walker, a log merchant from Clay County, has just arrived here, and reports that a cloudburst laid waist a strip of country about five miles wide along Little Sexton Creek and the south fork of the Kentucky River in Owsley and Clay Counties. The residence of Wade Marders, on Little Sexton Creek, was washed down and his wife and little girl drowned. Marders and several log hands escaped, taking shelter under a large rock on the hills. Three other houses were swept away, but it is not yet known what became of the occupants. Fences and barns were destroyed for miles up and down the creek and the people rendered destitute by the loss of property and provisions.

Eight Seamen Killed.

A special dispatch from Valparaiso Chili, says: The monitor Huascar, fresh from the new dry dock, arrived here the other afternoon. Scarcely had she cast anchor when a dreadful disaster occurred on board. Without warning the main pipe of the vessel burst, killing eight of the crew and probably fatally injuring four others. No further details can be obtained, as no one is permitted to go on board.

Five Dead.

The two massive boilers of the Planters' Oil Mill, at Greenville, Miss., exploded, wrecking the mill property and causing the death of five men and seriously injuring half a dozen others.

Burned a Village.

Havana special: The insurgent leader Valencia has burned the village of Pepe Antonio, Guayanacacoa, a short distance out of Havana, including a church.

An Educator Dead.

Benjamin Frankling Tweed, educator and author, died at the home of his son-in-law, Judge John W. Hammond, in Cambridge, Mass., aged 85.

Clothing Strike Off.

The garment workers of Baltimore, who have been out on strike for the past five weeks, declared the strike off and will returned to work.

Four Children Drowned.

On account of a flood in Turkey Cave, Lee County, Va., four children were drowned and several houses were washed away.

TORTURED IN CUBA.

HORROR ENACTED AT A PUBLIC EXECUTION.

Dread Spanish Inquisition Days Surpassed by the Garrote—Unfortunates Slowly Strangled to Death on the Scaffold—Agonizing Fate for Five.

Work of Official Bunglers.

A startling exhibition of bungling in the execution by the garrote of five Cuban prisoners took place at Havana. The men, classed as "murderers, violators and incendiaries" belonging to Cayajabo, were recently sentenced to be garroted, and at 7 o'clock Tuesday morning a strong force of infantry was drawn up in the form of a square around the spot where the garrote had been erected. The instrument of execution, a chair with a post behind it, an iron collar and screw behind it, which when turned strangles or breaks the neck of the victim, was set up by the famous executioner, Valentine Ruiz, who, for some reason not fully explained, acted upon this occasion as the assistant to his own assistant instead of as the principal executioner.

The five prisoners in their dungeons received the ministrations of the priests. One man confessed himself to be guilty of the crimes charged against him and asserted that his companions were innocent, the latter stoutly maintaining their innocence to the last.

The man selected to be the first victim quietly and coolly mounted the steps leading to the chair and took his seat. The man acting as executioner then twisted the lever or screw handle controlling the garrote, but he was evidently nervous, and this rendered him so weak that his hands slipped repeatedly from the lever. There were horrible, smothering, choking cries from the scaffold, and it was only after a long period of agony for the condemned man and almost torture for the spectators that the Cuban was pronounced dead.

But this was only a beginning of the terrible performance. The second victim was brought to the front and led up the steps to the scaffold by the priests and assistant executioner. Upon reaching the platform the unfortunate man made an effort to say something to the people surrounding him, but the executioner's hand was placed over his mouth, he was hastily bundled into the deadly chair and in another moment the iron collar was around his neck. If the executioner was nervous upon the occasion of the first killing he was ten times more so upon this occasion. The result was more slow, fearful strangulation and another horrible experience for the spectators.

By this time the prison officials, the priests and officers in command of the troops had endured so much that they openly denounced the acting executioner and called upon him to get down from the scaffold and let another man take his place. Thereupon the acting executioner feverishly called upon the executioner-in-chief, Valentine Ruiz, who from long experience is looked upon as being an expert in his line.

Ruiz, however, was almost as nervous and excited as his assistant and fumbled badly as he handled the third Cuban. But he succeeded in accomplishing the execution in shorter time and with less horror than his assistant. The fourth Cuban was then turned over to Ruiz. By this time Ruiz was shaking all over and he was much slower and considerably clumsier in sending the unhappy man out of the world. So much so that there was renewed murmuring at the official incapacity and Ruiz stumbled away from the death post, insisting in choking tones that his assistant must finish the day's work.

Consequently the assistant executioner again tried his hand at the terrible screw and was as unlucky as before, for there was another scene of horror which nearly caused strong men to faint before the fifth Cuban's life was pronounced extinct.

Horror Caused in Washington.

The message from Havana giving the details of the killing of five prisoners by the garrote raised a cry of horror in Washington. Senor Dupuy de Lome, the Spanish minister, admitted that the men had been killed, but declared that the form of punishment was the one prescribed by Spanish law. He said the men were negroes, and had been guilty of a most atrocious crime in hanging a merchant at Guira Melena and in killing a small boy at the same place. He said the details of the execution had been exaggerated to suit the Cuban sentiment in the United States.

The reports to the Cubans in Washington declare that the horrible execution of the five men at Havana is but a sample of the atrocious cruelties of Captain General Weyler in Cuba. They declare they have information indicating that such cruelties are practiced nearly every day in Cuba, and that they are so horrible as to be beyond comprehension.

Sparks from the Wires.

Allen Ballew, 74 years of age, has just been acquitted of the charge of murder at Lancaster, Ky.

While rabbit-hunting in Boyd County, Kentucky, Hugh Dixon accidentally shot and killed his companion, John Johnson.

An intelligent shepherd dog saved Mrs. Ollie W. Evans and her son Harry, aged 10, from cremation at Wilmington, Del.

The price of wire nails has been advanced 15 cents per keg—from $2.40 to $2.55. Cut nails will follow the advance in the same ratio.

Henry Ahrens, Jr., aged 18, of Laurium, Mich., was found dead in his bed. It is thought he was suffocated during a fit.

TO ROW ACROSS THE ATLANTIC.

Two Daring Men in an Open Boat to Cross the Ocean.

Preparations are well under way for the most daring attempt that has ever been made to cross the Atlantic in an open boat. George Harbo, New York pilot, fisherman and seaman from his earliest youth, proposes to row from New York to England, using an ordinary row boat, built after plans designed by himself, and intended to show the improvement which he claims may be made in the lifeboats now in use. No sailing will be done on this extraordinary trip. Harbo says he will pull out into the Atlantic with a companion, about the middle of June, and that from then on they will row to Europe. The two men will take turns in rowing the boat, each working about eighteen hours a day. Harbo estimates than an average of about four knots an hour, day and night, can be made in this way. According to this they would make the passage in from forty to forty-five days.

The boat has been built with a stout piece of oak running along the bottom and separated from the keel. Harbo coolly says that this is for the two men to lash themselves to when the boat is upset and the sea is too rough for them to right her. Each man in very rough weather is to be lashed at the end of a long line, tied about his waist, which will hold him to the boat when he is swept overboard, which Harbo expects will occur as a matter of course. In fact, it would seem that although the trip is to be made in June and July, Harbo looks forward to the roughest kind of a time and will only be disappointed if he encounters uniformly mild weather. The boat is 18 feet long with a 5-foot beam. She is clinker-built, of cedar, with oak timber, and weighs 200 pounds, drawing when light but three inches of water. The load which is to be put into her, however, will increase her draft to seven inches. She has the general appearance of a double-ended sea skiff. There is an air tight compartment in either end of the boat some twenty inches deep and three feet six inches long. These two tanks will make the boat unsinkable when they are intact. Next to the forward compartment there will be a twenty-gallon sheetiron water tank, which will conform exactly to the shape of the boat. Four other small tanks of a capacity of ten gallons each will occupy the corresponding position at the stern.

A canvas cover, under which the men may sleep, will button over the forward end of the boat. The men will carry extra oars and a large pair of sweeps, using the latter when they work together. These, with the instruments, cooking utensils and other necessities, will take up much of the spare room. The provisions are to consist largely of canned goods and oatenmeal. The latter will be especially useful, as sea water may be used in boiling it. The canned goods will be selected so as to resist the great heat of a calm midsummer day on the ocean. Two spirit compasses will be fixed in the bottom of the boat. When the sea is so rough that little or no headway can be made by rowing, the men will throw over a sea anchor made of canvas and opening like an umbrella. Harbo claims that two hours of work at the oar will make up for the drift of twenty-four hours in a storm with the sea anchor out. Changes of clothing for the men will be taken in a water-tight case. Their underclothing is to be lined with silk so as to avoid chafing. Harbo is 32 years of age, and has spent his life upon the sea.

HARBO'S EIGHTEEN-FOOT BOAT.

ITALIANS SHOW FIGHT.

Attempt to Break Out of the Deportation Pen at Ellis Island.

It was one continuous round of excitement on Ellis island Tuesday. Twice a large body of Italians, held for deportation, made desperate attempts to escape from their place of imprisonment, and but for the courage and alertness of the few keepers and inspectors who had them in charge riot and bloodshed might have resulted.

It was shortly after 10 o'clock when the first outbreak occurred. There were 250 savage looking men, mostly Italians, shut inside the "to be deported" pen on the second floor of the main building. Suddenly there was a murmur among them. It increased to a growl and to a howl of defiance and rage. Hundreds of sunburnt, dirty hands tried to tear open the wire work of the pen. It began to bend and in a moment more would have given way had not the keepers rushed up and down outside, pounding the protruding fingers.

Dr. Senner early in the day realized the gravity of the situation. He telegraphed to Washington that he must have more help. Just when all seemed peace the Arizona, the steamer which takes the immigrants from Ellis island to the battery, steamed in. As the released immigrants ran to board her some of them shouted to the throng of "detained." In a moment all was excitement again. A fierce rush was made. Savage blows were struck at the officials, and more than one knife was drawn in the crowd. The officials went at the undisciplined mob fiercely, and after a few minutes' fighting the little knot of breathless officers had the crowd subdued.

IN A RAGING BLIZZARD.

Furious Storms Sweep Down Upon Minnesota and Wisconsin.

The month of March went out with a roar that was heard and felt all over the Northwest. Minnesota specials indicate that the weather all over the State was severe. With a steadily and rapidly dropping thermometer there was a heavy wet snow, melting almost as fast as it fell. This was followed by sleet, and later hard little pellets of snow are driven before the gale, while frequent thunder and lightning accompany the blizzard. All street car traffic was suspended at West Superior on account of the blizzard, and in that city drifts six feet high are reported. St. Cloud reports that the snow is two feet deep on the level. The oldest inhabitant is unable to give testimony as to an equally severe storm for the season.

Over eight inches of snow fell throughout the greater part of Colorado Monday night. The snow fall promises to be greater than any during the winter. The snow was accompanied by a high wind. A severe blizzard also prevailed all over Nebraska.

Miss F. Jennie Duty, formerly general secretary of the National Non-Partisan W. C. T. U. and widely known throughout the country as a temperance worker, died at her home in Cleveland, the result of a paralytic stroke. The deceased was 45 years old.

BISMARCK IS NOW 81.

TIME HONORS AND SPARES THE IRON CHANCELLOR.

Hearty Congratulations Received by the Great German Statesman—He Makes a Speech to Thousands, Who Come from Hamburg.

Crowds Pay Tribute.

Prince Bismarck was 81 years old Wednesday and in honor of his birthday bands of music played in the Schloss park, at Freidrichsruhe, all the morning. Prince Bismarck entered the salon at 11:30 and found displayed on a table his birthday presents. He was affectionately greeted by his son, Count Herbert Bismarck, and by his daughter, Countess Rantzau. After Dr. Schwenninger had congratulated the prince the latter closely examined his portrait painted by Lenbach, who appeared later, whereupon Prince Bismarck greeted him with a "good morning."

TIME HONORS AND SPARES HIM.

Among the presents was a collection of articles from Madagascar, sent by Eugene Wolf. Emperor William's present to Prince Bismarck was a photograph of the imperial family, in a group, inclosed in a handsome frame. Count Von Waldersee and a deputation from the Halberstadt dined with Prince Bismarck.

Thousands from Hamburg.

Special trains from Hamburg brought some 3,000 persons, including 300 torchbearers. After dinner was over Prince Bismarck appeared on the balcony and the assembled bands played a choral. Replying to an address of congratulation, Prince Bismarck said that the good will of his neighbors was a necessity to every Christian German. He was pleased at having enjoyed the constant sympathy of the Hamburgers, which he had never lost, as he had lost several other sympathies. Expressing then a desire for the commercial prosperity of Hamburg, he declared that he was no fanatical agrarian, but that, after all, the agrarians were not without grounds for their opinions.

In conclusion he called for cheers for Hamburg and its rulers. In response to this prolonged cheers were given. There was then a brilliant torchlight procession, which occupied forty-five minutes in passing. Prince Bismarck stood most of that time, continually expressing his acknowledgments to those passing. He observed that he was no longer able to move as they did, but that his heart went with them.

WINTER WHEAT AND RYE.

The Farmers' Review Receives Reports from Ten States.

Reports have been received from the correspondents of the Farmers' Review in ten States on the condition of winter wheat and winter rye.

In Illinois winter wheat is in fair shape, but has been injured extensively by the late thawing and freezing weather. The percentage of damage runs all the way from 5 to 50. Fortunately, there are not many reports of the latter amount or near it. A like condition exists in Indiana. In Ohio the loss is still greater, and the present condition is below fair. Michigan reports great loss, but the condition, taking the State as a whole, is a little above fair. In Kentucky the crop is in a very uneven condition, some counties having good prospects, but others expecting little more than half a crop. The loss from freezing and thawing does not seem to be much of a factor. Missouri also has an uneven crop at this time, and the conditions have been various. Some counties have a good start, and no freezing and thawing has taken place. Other countries have lost half of the present stand from this cause alone. We may summarize by saying that the loss for the State has been considerable, and that the present conditions of the crop are fair. In Kansas and Nebraska the crop is in fair to good condition. Little loss has been experienced from freezing and thawing, in fact some of the correspondents complain that they have not had as much cold as they would like. In Iowa there has been small loss on account of recent changes of weather, and the crop in the State is in fair condition. In Wisconsin the crop is reported quite poor, and the recent losses have been great.

Winter rye is in much better condition than wheat, and is generally reported at an average of fair to good.

Notes of Current Events.

The wall of a building recently destroyed by fire fell upon a residence at Cleveland, O., killing Mrs. F. O. Bradford, of Olmstead Falls, O., a visitor in the house, and seriously injuring Miss Emma Deitrichs, a domestic.

James W. De Ormond, the counterfeiter, who has just completed a two years sentence in the Kings County (N. Y.) penitentiary for that crime, was handed over to officers of Paris, Tex. When he reaches there he will be tried on a charge of murder committed in 1891.

On the Chancellor's seventy-seventh birthday Emperor William sent to Prince Hohenlohe as a memento a bronze bust of himself. Most of the German sovereigns, Prince Bismarck and the German imperial ministers, telegraphed birthday congratulations to the Chancellor.

Mrs. Hiram Smith and family, of Coburg, Ore., are the innocent victims of an unknown person's hatred and live in daily fear. Repeated attempts have been made to poison the woman and her children, and of late the would-be poisoner has grown bold in his attempts.

It is announced that a large car factory, to be known as the Union car works and to be run on the co-operative plan, will be put into operation in North St. Louis, Mo., during the coming summer. It will be a large concern and expects to cut quite a figure in the manufacturing world.

The Treasury Department has evidence tending to show that the steamship Commodore, which recently cleared from the port of Charleston, S. C., with arms and ammunition, did not lose her cargo in a storm at sea, as reported by her captain, but landed it on the coast of Cuba.

The Masons of Elwood are arranging to erect a $25,000 temple in that city.

Monticello has 2,000 souls and six newspapers—four dailies and two weeklies.

A jury at Kokomo has awarded Abram Bates $400 damages for being put off an L. E. & W. train.

The Tipton County Commissioners have voted to build a $500 cottage at the soldier's home, at Lafayette.

Ed Moore, aged 12, in jumping from a Big Four freight train on which he was stealing a ride near Danville, was ground to pieces under the cars.

Muncie officers have discovered two-dollars bills which have been passing as ten-dollars bills. The bills have been altered with pen and ink.

Business in most of the Anderson factories is on the boom. Two hundred and sixty additional men will be put to work this week in the glass, cradle, and car-coupling plants.

Chicken fanciers of Grant, Cass, Madison Howard, Miami, and Clinton Counties have organized an association. A silver cup poultry show will be given in Marion next January.

In order not to break his engagement to lecture at Logansport, Henry Watterson hired a special car on the Wabash, from Peru to that city. Paid $50 for the special car and got $150 for the lecture.

Grant Moore, 3-year-old son of Henry W. Moore, near Arlington, while playing on the floor, fell into a pan of boiling water, in which his mother had been scalding a chicken, and received injuries from which he died in a few hours.

William Hecht of Fort Wayne, ascended a step-ladder to get a bucket from a high shelf. In reaching for the bucket the ladder gave way, and as he fell he reached out to catch himself. His hand caught on a meat hook and was torn in two.

A terrible accident happened at the elevator of the Noblesville Milling Company, by which Frederick L. Kinnamon lost both of his hands. Being a new employe and not having experience with machinery, he became entangled with some ropes and pulleys, and both hands were literally mashed and ground to pieces. Amputation was necessary. Mr. Kinnamon is a poor man and has a wife and two small children.

Over 12,000 people witnessed the burial of Mrs. Elizabeth Stanley Harrison, late Queen of the gypsy tribe, which took place at Oak Hill Cemetery Evansville. Her death occurred Sept. 20, 1895, at Corinth, Miss., and her remains were brought to Evansville September 22, being placed in a vault at the cemetery. Several hundred gypsy familes from all sections of this country were in attendance, besides five representatives from England and two from Spain. The Romany funeral rites were observed at the camp grounds, and later at the grave. Protestant services were conducted by a local clergyman. The grave was sealed, according to their custom, and the numerous floral offerings covered the ground for several yards on all sides.

Wholesale ejectment proceedings have been begun by the owners of the Wabash & Erie canal bed against owners of property abutting the old ditch in Wabash County who have encroached on the canal lands. Seventeen suits were filed, the plaintiffs being Elbert W. Shirk and Frederick Olcott. The complaints allege that the defendants are in unlawful possession of canal property, and demand that the land be restored and that reasonable damages be assessed. Messrs. Shirk and Olcott are filing suits of a similar character in every county from Wabash to Lafayette, they owning that eighty miles of the old canal bed. It is the impression that a scheme is on foot to dispose of the property to a railway company, and that the plaintiffs are taking this method of making a clear title.

Messrs. J. T. Anderson, superintendent of the Metropolitan Insurance Company, and J. D. Torsey, his local agent, both residing in Anderson, with their wives, were capsized in White River, and narrowly escaped drowning. The day was pleasant, and the men, who are experienced oarsmen, hird a boat and took their wives riding. They had been out about two hours and were returning when the boat was struck by a log near the Twelfth-street bridge and instantly upset, throwing the party into seven feet of water. Mr. Torsey was the only member of the party who could swim, but managed to get all ashore. Mrs. Anderson's dress was caught by the log, and she came near drowning before it was torn loose. She was unconscious for some time, but is thought to be out of danger now. Mr. Anderson clung to the boat till it drifted a half-mile down the river before he was rescued.

A curious case of restoration of sight is instanced in the case of John Hershman, an old soldier living in Tipton County, now drawing a pension of $72 per month for total blindness, given him with back pay several years ago by a special act of Congress. The other day Mr. Hershman, while sitting in the chair he has occupied constantly for thirty years, was attacked with a violently painful affliction of the eyes. The orbs inflamed until as red as fire, and were so swollen it was thought they must burst. After suffering the most excruciating agony for twenty-four hours the pain suddently left, and with it disappeared a thin film that covered the eyes, causing the sight to return completely, to the astonishment of Hershman, who can now see as well as he ever could, reading the newspapers with ease. This remarkable case of restoration of vision will raise a nice point for the Pension Department. Attorneys are of the opinion that Mr. Hershman can continue to draw his pension until the allowance is stopped by a special act of Congress.

Whether the new streets at Marion shall be alphalt or brick is a hotly-fought question. Petition in favor of alphalt was first circulated. Each petition represents about the same property frontage. The battle is waged so warmly that many fear the Council will split and leave the streets a mud-hole.

State Senator Holler, whose farm borders on the Kankakee River for three miles, is going to have the channel of that portion of the river made straight. The work will be done with a great steam dredge. Holler thinks that the straightening of the stream will make the drainage of the Kankakee lands much easier.

The City Health Inspector of Indianapolis has made the discovery that the local medical colleges have deposited ghastly refuse matter on the public dumping ground, human flesh and bones being found with undeniable evidence that it came from the dissecting room. Two other places have also been found where the medical college refuse found a dumping place. In one locality the headless trunk of a human being with the ribs exposed was left lying above ground, and also a leg and an arm, with a hand from which all the fingers had been cut. The medical colleges disclaim all responsibility, saying that they contracted for the removal and burial of the debris and suppposed that the work had been properly done

QUEEN OF THE CARNIVAL.

Miss Arthemise Baldwin—One of the Sweetest Maids of New Orleans.

One of the sweetest maids of New Orleans is Miss Arthemise Baldwin, who was crowned queen of the recent Mardi Gras in the city near the delta. She is the daughter of Albert Baldwin, president of the New Orleans National Bank. Miss Baldwin looked a real queen and certainly never did a real queen wear a more gorgeous coronation robe, a pretty picture of which was made by Illustrated American. This gorgeous robe was of the richest white satin embroidered with gold thread and jewels. Around the bottom of the skirt were five large coronets, wrought out of seed pearls and jewels. Above them was a rich applique of palest green velvet couched in gold thread and with the design picked out in amethysts, sapphires, emeralds and other glittering jewels. The corsage was cut round in the neck and the entire front was covered with the same exquisite jeweled embroidery. Huge puffs of satin formed the sleeves and on them the rich design of the skirt was repeated. About the neck was a costly medici collar, thickly studded with jewels on both sides until it formed a glittering mass of gems. From the shoulders, fastened by gems, hung the court train of royal purple velvet, deeply bordered with ermine, and lined with heavy white satin. The train, three yards long, was richly embroidered with fleur de lis, wrought in the same jewels as those used in embroidering the gown. About her white throat she wore a superb necklace of diamonds, a jeweled girdle spanned her waist, on her head she wore a crown and in her hand she bore a scepter.

MISS ARTHEMISE BALDWIN.

GENERAL KITCHENER.

Man Who Leads the Anglo-Egyptian Expedition Up the Nile.

Gen. Kitchener, who is in command of the Anglo-Egyptian expedition in the Soudan, is an able soldier and well fitted to be head of the enterprise by which it is hoped to reconquer East Soudan, now under the rule of the mahdi. He is the sirdar of the Egyptian army, and the expedition will consist chiefly of Egyptian troops. The native forces will be strengthened by 1,200 British troops, who will be under the command of Gen. Henderson, staff major of the army of occupation. The native army will be commanded almost exclusively by British officers. The force will march up the Nile, passing through the two Dongolas (old and new) on their way to Berber, and there will be fighting unquestionably at Dongola, where the mahdi has been collecting a strong force, to which he will add in anticipation of the approaching trouble. After Dongola is captured it will be made the base of operations against Berber. Twelve thousand Egyptian troops are on the advance already, and there is need for some alarm, for the dervishes are reckless fighters and scorn danger, believing, as they do, that if they die fighting they will be at once translated to the paradise of the koran. It is said that the purpose of the expedition is to assist Italy by this diversion near Abyssinia, but this is not believed. On the contrary, there can be no doubt that the sole purpose of this great undertaking is to re-establish British supremacy in the domain of the fanatical successor of the late prophet. The territory sought to be reclaimed for Egypt comprises Darfur, Kordofan, Sennar, Taka, the Equatorial province and Bahr-el-Ghazal. It was, until 1882, under Egyptian rule. In that year the revolt of the mahdi made it free. After the mahdi's death one of his lieutenants succeeded, and, with Omdurman as his capital, has since ruled over most of the territory. The khalifa still holds several of the prisoners taken at Khartoum. Last year France was said to have sent an expedition to the Soudan, but nothing has been heard of it.

PUBLIC DEBT STATEMENT.

Increase for the Month of March Is Given as $5,274,780.

The monthly statement of the public debt shows the debt, less cash in the treasury on March 31, to have been $942,342,253, an increase over last month of $5,274,780, which is accounted for by an increase of $14,209,522 in the amount of bonds delivered during the month, payment for which had been made previously. The increase in the cash during the month amounted to $8,934,741, making the net increase $5,274,780, as stated. The debt is classified as follows:

Interest bearing debt	$837,404,140
Debtion which interest has ceased since maturity	1,659,510
Debt bearing no interest	374,920,351
Total	$1,213,984,001

This, however, does not include $562,909,253 in certificates and treasury notes outstanding, which are offset by an equal amount of cash in the treasury. The cash in the treasury is given as follows:

Gold	$171,885,709
Silver	508,930,744
Paper	165,952,143
Bonds, disbursing officers' balances, etc.	28,200,349
Total	$874,969,947

Against which there are demand liabilities amounting to $603,327,198, leaving a net cash balance of $271,641,748, including the gold reserve.

News of Minor Note.

Patrick McGuinness, 90 years of age, was burned to death in a fire which destroyed his home at Middletown, N. Y.

James and Frank Tillman and Lucy Law were instantly killed by a rock crashing through the house where they were sleeping at Echo, W. Va.

CHAPTER II.—(Continued.)

"If it refers to my parents, I should like to hear it," returned the girl. "All I have ever been told is that my mother was grandma's daughter, that my father was your uncle, your father's elder brother. When I met you over at Frankfort and you told me you were my cousin, I could scarcely believe it. I had always imagined that all my relations were dead. Why is it that grandma never sees any of my father's family? Are they not friends?"

"I am afraid, Constance, she dislikes them all, including my father and myself."

"And you know why it is?"

"Yes, she showed such bitter animosity toward me and mine that I began to speculate as to the cause. Well, there was once a young girl, very much like you, Connie, who lived with her mother in a quaint country place, like Avondale Castle. The young girl being rich and very beautiful, had two stepping stones to fortune. The mother was an ambitious woman, and longed for one thing, which she had never been able to obtain, an entrance into good society. She determined, therefore, to buy a title for her daughter, and under that daughter's wing to obtain her wish. The two spent their time between London and Devonshire. The young lady was presented at court, and for one short season her beauty made her the rage. At the end of it she received a proposal of marriage from a man of title—an earl. The gentleman came of a proud, aristocratic family, which, however, he had brought to the verge of ruin. He proposed to the richest heiress in England, although he did not love her."

"And the lady?" said Constance. "Did she marry him for his title, or did she love him?"

"Unfortunately, my darling, she loved him far too well. Well, the marriage took place—one-half of the lady's fortune, which was considerable, went to free the mortgaged estates. Now, mark the sequel; at the end of a year the young countess returned to her girlhood's home, a child was born, and when the little thing was a few weeks old the mother died!"

"She was killed!" cried the girl, with flaming cheeks and tear-dimmed eyes—"killed by the cruelty and neglect of the man who had married her."

"Hush, my darling!" said Frank, taking her trembling hand in his. "That man was your father!"

CHAPTER III.

The London season began to flag; fewer horses and carriages were seen in the Row, fashionable squares began to look deserted, and fashionable beauties, jaded with ceaseless rounds of gayety, began to long for the refreshing breath of the sea.

Frank Howarth, calling one afternoon at Portland place, found the whole house in a state of the utmost commotion, the satin upholstery of the drawing room had disappeared behind brown holland covers, the great crystal chandeliers were enveloped in linen bags, and the piano at which Constance had sat so many nights playing sweet music to her lover was hidden beneath folds of linen, too.

"What is the meaning of it all, Connie?" asked the young man.

"It means that we are going away. Now, don't look dull, Frank; we are merely returning to Avondale Castle, and grandma is going to invite some people there, you amongst the number."

"Do you mean it?"

"Of course I do. And who do you think will be there, too? Why, Alice Greybrook—the tall, grave young lady who was at school with me at Frankfort, and who used to deliver to me such long lectures whenever I stole out in secret to meet you! She has been for a short time in a convent, and although she is quite rich, and of very good family, she intends to devote her life to nursing the sick, and all that sort of thing. She is coming over really to nurse poor grandma, but she will be such a companion for me. I love her so much more because she knows you, and will be able to talk about you."

This was the last day spent by Frank with his cousin in town. Shortly afterwards Mrs. Meason started with her granddaughter to spend the autumn recess at Avondale Castle.

The secret of the betrothal which Mrs. Meason had insisted upon had been so rigorously kept that when Lady Constance, with her grandmother, arrived at Avondale, not a soul knew of that young lady's engagement to her cousin. The sunlight was admitted into the dreary rooms; the faded hangings and tapestries were shaken out. It was as if the spirit of the young countess had returned from the grave to live once again that joyous life which had been hers in those early days in Avondale before the earl came to woo her for his wife.

It was a bright morning several days after Lady Constance's arrival. With her arm linked in that of her school-fellow she was standing at the window of her boudoir looking at the prospect which surrounded the Castle.

"The world is very beautiful," she exclaimed.

"Yes," said her companion, dreamily, "it is beautiful to those who are happy, but when the heart is not glad how soon the world changes, Constance!"

The speaker was a girl of twenty, with a singularly pale face and dreamy eyes. The singularity of her appearance was heightened by her dress, which was of black cashmere, quaintly cut, and ornamented merely by a large ivory cross, which she wore upon her breast. She and Lady Constance, having met at school, had been drawn together by some subtle influence which neither could explain, and had since remained firm friends.

"How grave you are, Alice," said Constance; "you are an enigma to me. It seems so strange that one so young and pretty should deliberately devote her time to nursing the sick, and wish for nothing better than to end her days in a convent. Now, if I had shown predilections of that kind it would have been less surprising."

"Why?"

"Because the life which I was compelled to lead during my childhood would have admirably qualified me for a nun."

Her companion looked at her in wonder. She had become very serious, and her eyes were filled with tears.

"Constance," said she, "were the days of your childhood so very unhappy that the memory of them makes you cry?"

"They were not happy days," said Constance, sadly; "I remember as vividly as if it were yesterday wandering about the park, and wondering why children were born, since the world was so solitary."

"Your mother died here, did she not, Constance? In Avondale Castle, I mean."

"I believe so, though grandma has never spoken of it to me. I was three weeks old when she died. Finally grandma took me to a school in Germany, and about a year ago I went to Frankfort and met you."

"And we became friends, did we not? There was something in your face, Constance, which appealed to my heart, and drew me irresistibly toward you."

"You have always been so good to me," said Constance, "and now I love you more than ever, because I was with you the first time I ever saw Frank. Do you remember that day?" continued the girl, dwelling lovingly upon every word, "when you and I, having lost ourselves in the forest, came upon a young gentleman, who, in the most courtly manner possible, conducted us back to the seminary? He asked our names; you drew me toward you as if to protect me from his admiring glance, and replied with tremendous dignity, 'We think you for your courtesy, sir, and wish you good-by.' But it seemed to me that you were too reserved, so I replied, 'I am Lady Constance Howarth,' and then after a very few words we discovered that we were cousins. After that, I met him in secret every day, then you discovered this and lectured me; afterward, at your express entreaty, I wrote to grandma, telling her that I had met my cousin, that I loved him very dearly, and that he loved me."

"And on receipt of that letter she came over and took you from the school?"

"Yes; but when we had been three days in London, Frank appeared and asked me to be his wife. Oh, the scenes which followed! Grandma was pitiless to us both. First she refused to listen to him; then she bade me swear that I would never see him again. But I could not do it. I had learned to love him too well. All that is passed," concluded the girl. "I am now engaged to Frank with grandma's consent, so for the future all will be well."

"We will hope so, dear," said her friend, as she kissed her tenderly.

CHAPTER IV.

For three days after the return of the family to Avondale Castle nothing of any moment occurred; life went on evenly and pleasantly enough to the young, while a burden of sorrow seemed to fall upon the shoulders of one woman alone—the mistress of the house.

Since her return to Avondale Castle Mrs. Meason had been a changed woman; from no apparent cause her strength gave way; she spent most of her time in her room alone, dispensing even with the society of Miss Greybrook.

"Leave me to myself," she said, wearily, to Constance; "if I husband my strength now, I shall be the better able to entertain my guests."

"Constance," said Alice one morning, "I am going back to France."

"Alice!"

"Your grandmother does not require me; in a few days the house will be full, and my presence can be easily dispensed with. There is an opening in the convent for a nursing sister; I am going to take it!"

"And you can sacrifice yourself so! Oh, Alice, it is dreadful, and if you wished your life might be a happy one!"

"And will it not be happy?" returned the girl. "Is it not the life I have longed for—to minister to the sick, to soothe the sorrowful, to give help to the needy? Constance, dear, I want you to promise me before I go that if ever you are in trouble or in need of help you will seek it at my hands? You saw awhile ago that I was sad. I was; but it was on your account; not mine."

"On my account?"

"Yes; there is some trouble in store for you. I know it, for I have had such a strange dream! It haunts me, and all day I hear a voice whispering in my ear, 'Save her! save her!'"

Her face was growing deathly pale, and she trembled violently. She pressed her thin white hands upon her eyes, as if to shut out some terrible vision.

As Constance turned to answer her friend she was amazed to see that Alice was as pale as death; her eyes were fixed, not upon Constance, but beyond her, and Constance, turning quickly, started and turned pale, too.

Close to them stood a short, powerfully built man, with a swarthy skin, piercing black eyes and bushy eyebrows. His figure, though powerful, was elegant, and his dress that of a gentleman. He stood smiling, his eyes fixed with an admiring look upon Constance.

"I fear, madam, I have alarmed you," he said, speaking with a strong foreign accent and removing his hat. "I was passing through the neighborhood, and curiosity led me toward the Castle, which I believed to be untenanted. May I ask if I am addressing its mistress?"

"No; it belongs to my grandmother, Mrs. Meason."

"And your name is—if I may make so bold?"

"Lady Constance Howarth," was the cold reply.

He drew out a card case, and handed her a card with another profound bow and a look of increased admiration.

"Will you give Mrs. Meason that card? I have the pleasure of knowing her very slightly."

So saying, he raised his hat, made a last profound obeisance to both ladies, and walked slowly away.

Constance looked at the card, and read on it the stranger's name:

"THE DUKE D'AZZEGLIO."

In the corner was printed the address of the Spanish Embassy.

At dinner that evening Lady Constance told her grandmother of her meeting with the Duke d'Azzeglio.

"Do you know him, grandma?" she asked.

Mrs. Meason answered in the affirmative, and seemed indeed not at all ill pleased at the knowledge of the duke's presence in Avondale.

"He is a Spaniard, but his nationality counts for nothing," explained Mrs. Meason. "He is as much English as Spanish—as much French as either. He has been everywhere and knows everything. A most interesting man."

Two days later Alice Greybrook took her departure from Avondale, and returned to her convent home in France. Constance accompanied her friend as far as the station. On her return to the castle she was informed by the footman that her grandmother wished to see her in the drawing room; she went and found Mrs. Meason entertaining none other than the Duke d'Azzeglio.

He was, as Mrs. Meason had said, a well-informed man. He had traveled widely, had seen much, and knew how to talk of what he had seen; he interested the girl so deeply in his conversation that when he rose to go, and Mrs. Meason expressed a wish that he would come again, Constance cordially echoed her grandmother's words. The duke smiled.

"I hope I may soon have the honor of receiving you as my guests," he said, bowing to both ladies. "For the present I am a resident in Avondale. I have taken Lord Foley's house."

This visit to the Castle was the prelude to many others. During the few days which followed, the duke found several opportunities of presenting himself at Avondale Castle.

Its doors were thrown open to him. He was glad. Whenever he entered those doors he was pretty sure to find himself sooner or later in the company of Lady Constance.

(To be continued.)

Think of the Future.

Despite all that has been urged in behalf of sensible forest supervision in this country, the ruthless destruction goes on almost unabated. Only about a quarter of the timber cut year by year has its place supplied by new growth. If this rate is to continue it is easy to see how short a time will elapse before the land is bare and the streams dried up.

Mr. Fernow, chief of the Forestry Division of the United States Department of Agriculture, estimates the value of our timber land at a thousand millions of dollars. Surely this is a property worth caring for.

Two plans for helping to put things on a sound basis have lately been proposed. Mr. Fernow advocates a law establishing an American college of forestry.

Professor Sargent of Harvard suggests the establishment of a chair of forestry at West Point with the view of ultimately using the army in part to preserve the forests.

Perhaps both ideas might be carried out independently with good results. Certainly all possible educational means should be used to place our people on a level as to information with those of France and Germany.

Forest fires alone are said to destroy ten million dollars' worth of timber annually. Intelligent forest wardens could prevent much of this. Waste—the greedy cutting of large and small trees at one sweep—destroys more than fires.

If we are to have any forests left at all, the United States Government and the several States must push vigorously the policy of founding and maintaining forest preserves.

A Mechanical Horror.

Machinery is a monthly journal published at Johannesberg, South Africa. In the October number just received is an account of a most remarkable clock belonging to a Hindu Prince, which the editor thinks the strangest piece of machinery in India.

Near the dial of an ordinary looking clock is a large gong hung on poles, while underneath, scattered on the ground, is a pile of artificial human skulls, ribs, legs, and arms, the whole number of bones in the pile being equal to the number of bones in twelve human skeletons.

When the hands of the clock indicate the hour of one, the number of bones needed to form a complete human skeleton come together with a snap, by some mechanical contrivance the skeleton springs up, seizes a mallet, and walking up to the gong, strikes one blow.

This finished, it returns to the pile and again falls to pieces. When two o'clock, two skeletons get up and strike, while at the hours of noon and midnight the entire heap springs up in the shape of twelve skeletons, and strikes, each one after the other, a blow on the gong, and then fall to pieces, as before.

Large Enough.

A foot traveler through one of the hilly regions of Ireland came one day upon a curious little cabin, so small as to seem hardly large enough for a human habitation. While she was whimsically considering as to whether it might not be the abode of the famous "good people," about whom so many loving superstitions cling, the figure of a short, stout old man emerged from the cabin, and stood confronting her in smiling silence.

After salutations had been exchanged the traveler laughingly told the old man that she had half-fancied his dwelling the home of fairies.

"No, indade, ma'am, but it's a good warm place, God bless it," replied the old man.

"But surely you cannot stand up in it?" said the traveler, curiously.

"An' fwhat nade to shtand, ma'am?" returned the owner of the tiny house. "Shure, an' Oi can come outside to do that same, an' whin Oi'm insoide, it's mesilf that can either go to bed or sit down, ma'am!"

There was such warmth in the smile with which this cheerful philosophy was propounded that the traveler was not disposed to pick flaws in it, and smiled acceptance of its truth.

Neither Was He.

"My good man," said the titled gentleman who had been violating a municipal ordinance, "I am not subject to the laws here. I belong to the nobility."

"Well, begorra," replied Mr. Terrence Flynn, "for the matther o' that, naythere am Oi. Oi belong till the police force."—Washington Star.

A good deal of interest is manifested just now in an old document on exhibition in Bucksport, Me. It is a commission signed by Thomas Pownall, Governor of Massachusetts, appointing Jonathan Buck first lieutenant of a company to invade Canada, and bears the date of March 13, 1758.

As the port of Cronstadt is to be closed to merchant vessels, the port of St. Petersburg will be excavated to the depth of the canal leading into it, twenty-two feet, and enlarged so as to hold at least twenty-four large steamers at a time.

NOTES ABOUT SCHOOLS AND THEIR MANAGEMENT.

Bright Side of the Country School as Compared with the City — Suggestion About Discipline — Tests for Good Language Teaching—Notes.

The Bright Side.

Have you ever felt just a little discontented with your country school? Has the path between it and your boarding place seemed long, hot and dusty in the fall, cold and snowy in the winter, and wet and muddy in the spring? Perhaps the contrast has suggested the thought that it is the lot of some teachers to use pavements and street cars. Possible while discharging the manifold duties of principal, grammar-grade, intermediate and primary, teacher and janitor all in one, it has occurred to you that it would be pleasant to teach one grade, and have no sweeping, dusting nor building of fires! It may be that you recall some other undesirable features of country schools, but we will turn from the bright side. Suppose you jot down a list of the pleasant things, the privileges of a country school. Have you completed the list. Did you note the pure air among the privileges? "You did not count that?" Well, you would find to your sorrow how much it counts if you were compelled to do without it. Did you count cheery sunshine? No? Well, surely you did not forget to count the blessed privilege of a play ground; a place where the children may "romp and holler," and give vent to the frolicsome animal spirits which are so attractive when there is a safety valve, and so troublesome when unduly repressed? Do you think that pure air and sunshine and play grounds are as much a matter of course as a schoolroom? Would that they were! But alas for the children and teachers and alas for the nation, they are not!

If you should receive a letter saying: "We need another teacher in the New York City corps. Will you accept the position?" Would you accept? Would you close the door of your country school full of pleasant anticipations of a place in the graded schools of a great city? Next fall you might open the door of the same country school prepared to make the list of privileges longer, and to count some of them much higher than you do to-day.

Jacob A. Riis, in the September Century, has given us a glimpse of schools where pure air and invigorating sunshine and playgrounds are so expensive that the unfortunate pupils and teachers must go without them. Fancy exchanging your sunny little school house with its play ground, for "a class-room where the air is so 'vitiated' foul and unhealthy" that the teachers are compelled to suspend studies for a time during each session, to open all windows and doors for the admission of fresh air, exercising the children by calisthenics during the time the windows are open, whatever may be the outside temperature at any season of the year, class-rooms in which the children spend five hours of the day, breathing sometimes little less than rank poison." Some of the class-rooms are so dark that "even on a day bright with summer sunshine they have to burn gas in them." Some of the playgrounds are merely large rooms, of which Mr. Riis says "There is always need of a lamp. In the cellar-like gloom of these cheerless apartments the boys and girls dodge countless iron posts and pillars in their play. In the most recently built schools these have been abolished, and a stone floor has been substituted for the dusty boards, but there is no trick of construction that can bring sunlight and cheer into them. * * * The wife of a missionary, who having spent half a life time sharing her husband's labors among the heathen, returned to New York and civilization, overjoyed at the thought of having an opportunity to give her boys proper schooling, but horrified at what she saw at the public school to which she took them, marched them off at once to the nearest private school that was not like a dungeon, as she said."

Mr. Riis continues: "In the matter of healthy play the schoolboy in New York does not have a chance. With boys to play is to run. To run they must have room. How much room is there on one floor for the children to run in, who, sitting down, pack three rooms? They must either go on the street or they are set loose in the play-room on sufferance. * * * The result was described by an employe in one East Side school, one of the best in the city, where more than three thousand children go. 'There is generally one of the teachers looking after them to see that thy don't overdo it. They have to make noise kind of easy-like. Anyhow, they can't all be here. Most of them stay upstairs studying at recess. It has to be that way.' And," Mr. Riis adds, "down in the Allen street school, which is one of the worst in the city—where the play ground is, if anything, darker and more repulsive than the Wooster street, the janitress explained the prevailing quiet in so great a crowd by the statement that 'these children are of a kind that have to be kept down.' As if they were not kept down enough out of school, poor wretches! They were the children of the poorest refugee Jews."

Think of teaching such children, you who do not appreciate your privileges! How would you like to act as a sort of policeman or prison-guard to help "keep down" those poor little unfortunates? How would you like to teach them when they file back to their desks in the crowded gas-lighted foul-aired school room? If all the bad boys who have ever annoyed you were condensed into one, he would be meek when compared with the bad ones who come of generations of vicious parents and have all their evil tendencies fostered by their environments.

If you were teaching in the Allen or Wooster street school and should receive a photograph of the country school you last taught, wouldn't you gaze at it fondly?

Read "Play-grounds for City Schools" in the September Century and you may look at your surroundings with "eyes that see," and with "ears that hear;" you may find a bit of a sermon in the jingle that some of the "primary's children" rattle off on Friday afternoon:

"For—we—are—often—thankless—for Rich—blessin's—we'n—we—sign,
'Cause—we—think—some—neighbor—has A bigger—piece—o'—pie."

—Indiana School Journal.

Suggestion About Discipline.

Let it be influence and not tyranny that governs your school. Influence is gained by sympathy and your influence will always be in proportion to your intellectual sympathy. Make the children feel that you are their friend and helper and not a police officer. I will illustrate by one or two simple incidents that come to my mind. Marbles began to appear about three weeks ago. I always dread marbles. It means tardiness, idleness and dirty hands, so I began to devise means of keeping them away from school. I said to the children, "I have noticed two things in particular about marble-time, one is, it causes tardiness, and if you look at your hands I think I need not tell you about the other. Time lost is lost forever. There is no water in our buildings, and you lose your precious school time. What had we better do?" The children at once agreed to leave their marbles at home and play after school, and they did so, too. Every one was pleasant about it, and each thought he was following his own good judgment.

One day last fall as I came to school I noticed that our usually neat yard was strewn with papers. The boys had been making what they called paper snappers. As fast as one was broken it was thrown down and another made. I was provoked, and my first impulse was to scold, for I learned this before I knew the better way, and the power of habit is strong, but instead I asked the boys to show me one, to unfold and refold it; to show me how they made it pop so loud, where they learned to make them, etc. By this time there was a crowd of interested boys around me. Then, I said: "Those are quite funny playthings, but they don't seem to help the appearance of our yard, do they?" Without a word they commenced picking up the papers. When it was clean again, I said: "Play with the papers all you wish, but keep the broken ones in your pockets, and when you pass into the room put them into the waste basket." I had no more trouble, and soon they disappeared entirely. These are small things, but I have only small things to give you from my own experience and straws show which way the wind blows.—Ex.

Gardening for the School Room.

A collection of seeds should be made in the fall, but, if this has not been done, a simple mention will usually elicit a response from the children of more than the teacher can use. But be sure to accept all with polite remarks. Peas, beans, morning glories, wheat, corn and oats are standards to which the teacher may add what else she pleases. From those named the development of the embryo, and the varying appearances of the cotyledons may be observed.

Flax and cotton seed may be sown in pots or window boxes, giving a good foundation for lessons on "Plants Used for Clothing."

Be sure to plant two or three potatoes; it will interest city children very much to see them grow. Explain, before planting, the peculiarities of the potato's growth; that the part which we eat is a thickened root-stalk, and that the eyes, so-called, are buds from which it will grow. Sweet potatoes, grown in water, give a vine which is quite ornamental.

Bunches of twigs—lilac, willow, oak, elm, maple, in fact, anything that grows near—may be kept in water, and their unfolding will be watched with great interest by the children. A study of the catkins as they unfold, and the information that they are the blossoms of the trees, will usually awaken the attention of the little people. This the teacher may easily hold by short informal talks, leading up, later on, to the shapes and arrangement of leaves, development and uses of the fruit, and the more important facts of tree growth. Nor does the lesson, begun in the window garden, stop with botany. The industrial uses of trees, as shown in wood, and the consideration of the influences of trees on rainfall, climate, etc., are strictly in order.

Of the bulbs, hyacinths may be readily grown in water, giving the children full opportunity to observe the roots as well as to enjoy the beauty of the flowers. The myth of Hyacinthos may be told in this connection.

The Chinese narcissus, which is readily obtained from the florist, is easily grown in a bowl of water.—American Teacher.

That right speaking is incidental.

That he talks to say something that he wishes to say.

That correct use of language is rhythmic, comes of itself.

That he listens as well as he talks.

That he cares more to have some thing to say than to say it.

That what he learns in the language class is practiced unconsciously in all exercises.—American Teacher.

ITALY'S PRIME MINISTER.

Marquis Rudini, Who Succeeded Sig. Crispi as Minister of State.

Marquis Antonio di Rudini-Sharabia, who succeeded Signor Crispi as Minister of State in Italy, is, like his predecessor, a Sicilian and comes from one of the aristocratic families that were scattered over the Island of Etna by the Spanish domination. He is now nearly 60 years old. At the age of 31 he was prefect at Palermo, and in that year of the revolution he tried to restore the kingdom of the two Sicilies to the house of Bourbon. This revolution was ferocious, neither giving nor accepting quarter. The triumphant population committed most abominable excesses. Human butcher shops were opened in the public squares, where the flesh of the Italian carbineers killed at the barricades was sold for next to nothing. Rudini risked popularity in order to save Italian unity. He directed the suppression of the revolt with a firmness that bordered on cruelty. The revolution was crushed and Italian unity escaped the peril of dismemberment, which had threatened it for an instant. But for many years the remembrance of this bloody and merciless suppression weighed heavily on Signor Rudini's reputation. As a politician the Marquis di Rudini took a leading rank among the rightists as soon as he was sent to parliament. His conduct during the revolution of 1866 had classed him among the fearless and resolute men. And so, after Mentana, when Emmanuel desired to begin a reactionary policy, Rudini was selected to act as minister of the interior. He was expected to show his strong qualities against the militant democracy, which was incensed at the king. The new minister showed himself equal to the expectation and was almost spiteful in his zeal against the republicans. But at the end of two months he was compelled to retire and again took his place among the right. He was not heard of again until he assumed the reins of government on the retirement of Signor Crispi in 1891. He remained in power two years, but his ministry was disastrous financially. Since that time Rudini has not been a leader in the councils of Italy.

NEW-MADE PEER.

Henry Hucks Gibbs Recently Created Peer in England.

Among the recently created peers of England is Henry Hucks Gibbs. He is a lawyer, has been a justice, is a great financier, and more or less of a politician. Mr. Gibbs is the eldest son of the late George Henry Gibbs, of Aldenham, and was born in 1819. His public school education was at Rugby, after which he attended Exeter College, Oxford, where he won his degree of B. A. in 1841. In 1844 the same college made him M. A. He is a magistrate for Middlesex and Hertfordshire, is a director in the Bank of England, and is the senior partner in the firm of Antony

Gibbs & Sons, merchants. Mr. Gibbs has been a parliamentarian. In 1891 he represented the City of London in the Commons. He succeeded T. C. Baring to this duty on the death of that member in 1891. He retired in 1892, and in that year his son was elected M. P. to represent the city in his stead. He has another son, Vicary Gibbs, in Parliament. This son represents the St. Albans division of Hertfordshire.

The Community of Letters.

Writers have liked to speak of the Republic of Letters, as if to mark their freedom and equality; but there is a better phrase, namely, the Community of Letters; for that means intercourse and comradeship and a life in common. Some take up their abode in it as if they had made no search for a place to dwell in, but had come into the freedom of it by blood and birthright. Others buy the freedom with a great price, and seek out all the sights and privileges of the place with an eager thoroughness and curiosity. Still others win their way into it with a certain grace and aptitude, next best to the ease and dignity of being born to the right. But for all it is a bonny place to be. Its comradeships are a liberal education. Some, indeed, even there, live apart; but most run always in the market place to know what all the rest have said. Some keep special company, while others keep none at all. But all feel the atmosphere and life of the place in their several degrees.—Century.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF DeKALB COUNTY

JAMES A. BARNS, Editor.

Registered at the Auburn, Indiana, Post Office as second-class matter.

THURSDAY.....APRIL 2, 1896

At Kendallville.

Quite a large number of representative democrats took the special train to Kendallville yesterday morning, at Waterloo were joined by a full delegation from Waterloo and the county delegation from Steuben county. At Corunna other delegates boarded the train. Arriving at Kendallville, they were met by a train load from the south, and led by the band up town and to the Spencer Opera House. There was no meeting till one p. m. however, and at that hour they were called to order by the district chairman, T. R. Marshall who made a bright and eloquent speech. He told them, there was noth ing to be discouraged over in the outlook, that though now and then defeated, the principles of the party would never die. He read the call to show how many delega tes each county was entitled to. On motion by Dr. Nusbaum, seconded by Ballou, Judge Ed O'Rourke was made permanent chairman. The editors were as usual made secretaries. The Judge made a moderate and sensible speech asking that disturbing trifles be cast aside, that all might unite in the grand purpose of upholding the party doctrines. He thought we should not cross a bridge till we got to it, nor commit ourselves to a party policy, till the state and national convention should lay down a platform. Do not hamper our candidate for congress. and Col. McDonald moved that we proceed to nominate a candidate for congress, and as this carried, he as an old soldier wished to nominate the son of a soldier J. M. Robinson, whose father had suffered in Libby prison. There were loud cheers. Each county, then seconded the motion in speeches by Hanan of Lagrange, John Robbins of DeKalb, Parker of Noble, Yotter of Steuben, and Judge Dawson of Ft. Wayne. Ballou, also of Lagrange, made a brief but telling speech, alluding in a feeling manner to Robinson's filial support of his widowed mother, while he was yet a lad. Cheer after cheer rang through the house, and a unaminous rising vote was the result. Robinson then made a brief but most excellent speech. It was not personal success we should seek so much as as the success of right principles. And in th's line, he alluded to Grover Cleveland to Senators Voorheees and Turpie, to Gov. Matthews and Tom Taggart, and each name was heartly cheered, the heartiest being for the name of Cleveland. He said in effect, there should be no local platforms made to hamper local candidates, like candidates for congress. He had faith in the wisdom that would prevail at state and national conventions. He spoke feelingly of the rights of the laborer, as he had himself been for years, a laborer in the shops at Ft. Wayne, and know whereof he spoke. He was cheered to the echo. The convention thanked the people of Kendallville for their hospitality, and then there was adjournment. A pleasant feature of the meeting was the presence of a large number of ladies and by request, smoking was discontinued as an act of deference to them. We saw no drunkenness that day, and no more orderly or quiet crowd of the size has ever been got together in this section, as far as we can remember It had been the desire of some, that resolution endorsing free silver should be adopted. But so many thought this unwise, that it was abandoned.

State Senator.

At Kendallville, many democrats asked us, why a state senator for Noble and DeKalb was not nominated at that meeting, as had usually been done. The reason is, that Noble county had not selected her delegates. DeKalb has selected hers, but there seems to be a disposition to wait, as the nomination is an important one, and will require a strong man to make the race. All this was talked over and the general opinion was the DeKalb county would select the man. And the man most spoken of was Hon. S. S. Shutt, as it is believed his high character and well known ability and popularity, would insure a successful election. He would certainly carry DeKalb, and we believe he could carry Noble. Such men as he are needed in the state assembly, but we have not learned whether he would, or would not, accede to the general wishes and make the race. We should be glad to hear from him on this important subject.

—The weather turned cool last evening, and by this morning, there was a fierce, high wind, that cut one to the very bones.

It has been in the market for over twenty years and constantly grown in favor and popularity. For sale at 25 and 50 cents per bottle by Davenport the Druggist. 14-18.

—D. R. Best, of Angola, was in the city this week partly to let his friends know he would be a candidate in the republican state convention for the office of Judge of the Appellate Court. From a pretty full acquaintance with Mr. Best we do not hesitate to say we think him admirably suited to the place. He is a lawyer of ripe experience and studious habits and has a reputation for integrity and fair dealing, such as a man should have who fills such a high place in any court. If a republican is to fill this place, we know of no one we would sooner see get it than Mr. Best. Besides he has been for some years a member of the "press gang," being one of the owners and managers of the Steuben Republican, an excellent journal. So editors over the state will feel honored to have amember of their "guild" promoted to a place on the supreme bench.

—It's all the same, a slight cold, congested lungs or severe cough. One Minute Cough Cure banishes them. Davenport the Druggist.

—MARRIED:—At the Lutheran parsonage this afternoon at 3:30 by J. D. Brosy, Ed. Hilkert of Swan Ind., and Ora Bolliard of Swan Ind.

—Busy people have no time, and sensible people have no inclination to use a slow remedy One Minute Cough Cure acts promptly and gives permanent results. Davenport the Druggists.

—Township elections were held in Michgan, Ohio, and Illinois Monday. In Michigan the democrats made decided gain, but in the other states there was little or no change.

—Take a dose of DeWitt's Little Early Risers just for the good they will do you. These little Pills are good for indigestion, good for headache, good for liver complaint, good for constipation. They are good. Davenport the Druggist.

—The Auburn Summer Normal will begin Monday June 1st and continue six weeks. This earlier date than previous years, it is thought, will accommodate the greater number.

—It's just as easy to try One Minute Cough Cure as any thing else. It's easier to cure a severe cough or cold with it. Let your next purchase for a cough be One Minute Cough Cure. Better medicine; better result; better try it. Davenport the Druggist.

—Rhode Island is the first state to hold a general election this year, Tuesday April 1, was the day. There was little interest shown and the republicans carried the state by about 10,000 plurality or about the same as a year ago. They have elections of state officers every year.

—We might tell you more about One Minute Cough Cure, but you probably know that it cures a cough. Everyone does who has used it. It is a perfect remedy for coughs, colds, hoarseness. It is an especial favorite for children, being pleasant to take and quick in curing. Davenport the Druggist.

—Geo. Quince and wife departed this morning for Fort Wayne, in company with Mrs. Quince's father Mr. Dirrim who will have his eyes operated on by Dr. Wheelock at the Hope hospital. Mr. Dirrim is some better and after the veil as it is called, is removed, he can probably see some.

There is an "April 1" on Arthur Olds and wife, as reported by Dr. Vesta M. Swarts. Last evening there was born to them a nice little girl baby. We say it is "nice," though we have not the honor of its acquaintance, but we feel safe in saying it is. And we are anxious, to ask its happyparents, "Which is the sweetest and prettiest baby in town?" and see them scratch their heads thinking over a long list of Auburn babies to see which is really the prettiest. We do not suppose they could decide in a month. Arthur we are pleased to inform our readers, is doing as well as could be expected. We hope the young mother is, and that the little one may "live long and prosper."

—MARRIED: April 2, 1896, at the residence of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Marion Pence in Butler township, Mr. Clinton J. Feagler and Miss Florence L. Pence, Rev. W. L. Meese officiating. The COURIER congratulates the young pair, and sends best wishes.

—Judge Allen Zollars, of Ft. Wayne is being mentioned as a candidate on the democratice ticket for governor. We know of no man in the state who is better equipped for this important and honorable place than Judge Zollars, and that is saying a good deal, for Indiana is full of excellent material. If the judge himself desires this honor we shall be pleased to see him succeed.

—DeKalb county can furnish talent for any and all occassions. There has recently came to our notice a clever little party general known as the Hoosier Pleasure Party who have during the past winter been playing that bright and witty comeda drama, "Under the Laurels," with John Madison Morton's "Desperat Game" as a curtain riser. This company is composed of strictly ladies and gentlemen most all of whom we are personally acquainted with. The company is under the management of W. O. Rose who has been on the stage for several years. He paints all their special scenery. The company is composed of Anna Ditmar, Nettie Myers, Eva Ridgeway, Jessie Ditmar, John Wanamaker, M. H. Olinger, F. C. Miller, H. L. Mason, J. L. Mason, C. E. Myers, W. E. Rose, G. W. Eckhart, Leona Loveland, F. W. Rugman and Atlanta Link.

Surprise.

Last week the friends and neighbors of Ephraim Shipe in Fairfield planned a surprise on him on Tuesday, March 31. It was his 73rd birthday and they managed to get his son, Leonard Shipe to take him over to Ashley and Hudson, so that on his return, he found the house crowded with nearly fifty of the neighbors. A good old-fashioned visit followed, which the old gentleman enjoyed fully with the rest.

J. J. Latson who lives north of town met with quite a serious accident while returning to his home yesterday. He was driving up Main street when he overtook the men who were scraping the street. He drove up along side of the scraper and was busily engaged in conversation, and not noticing his horse, the animal wandered off to the side of the street and ran against the hitching post in front of Mrs. Silver's residence. The wagon was upset and Mr. Latson thrown out, injuring him in various places. The men on the scraper carried him into Mrs. Silver's residence and summoned Dr. Hines who ministered to his injuries. He was not able to return to his home until late last night. Dr. Hines informs us that he is in a very critical condition.

—Mr. and Mrs. Brent reached here Saturday, he coming from California, and she from Canton, Ohio, where she had been for some weeks with her sister, Mrs. E. P. Elson. Mrs. Elson is in poor health and possibly Mrs. Brent may remain at her bedside more or less till she is better. Mr. Brent is now giving his attention to gold mining. He and others have purchased tracts of land in the original district where Sutter's mill was and where Marshall found the first gold in the winter of 1848. The old placers diggings still have gold enough to in places to pay for working, and parties are busy in that section turning the dirt over and washing it, Men are hired to dig, but the main part of this work is done by forcing a stream of water through a hose and nozzle, against the hillsides and so washing the dirt down. There is no expense for stamp mills. And new methods enable them to get a paying amount of gold out of poor ground.

OBITUARY.

Rebecca Beaty was born January 20, 1820, in Cumberland Co. Pa. She was married to Uriah Butler, April 25, 1844, in Ashland Co. Ohio. To them were born seven children, three sons and four daughters, of whom all but one survive her. They moved at an early date to Wyandotte county, Ohio, and later to DeKalb county Indiana. Afterward they resided for six years in Cass Co. Mich., and since that date in this county. Mr. Butler died, three years ago, last December. Mrs. Butler departed this life at the home of her son-in-law, B. F. Sponhower, in Auburn, April 2, 1896, at the age of 76 years, 2 months and 13 days. She was a member of the U. B. church about forty years, The faith by which she lived gave her triumph in death. Funeral services were conducted by Rev. D. B. Keller, Sunday afternoon. Her remains were intered in Woodlawn cemetery.

The Supreme Court of the United States has rendered a decision which denies the claim made by Theodore F. Brown in a lower court when he refused to answer in an interstate commerce case, alleging that his testimony might incriminate himself. The decision affirms the right of the court to compel an answer by a witness to questions relating to interstate commerce, but it was not unanimous, as Justices Field, Shiras, Gray and White held that the constitutional provision is sufficient to relieve Brown from the requirement to answer. The decision is a highly important one, as under it the commission will be able to force witnesses to testify in cases where other evidence would not be strong enough to convict of breaches of the interstate commerce law. Up to date it could not do this, for which reason the law was practically a dead letter, railroad officials discriminating in favor of certain persons and places and laughing in their sleeves at the futile character of the efforts made to compel them to deal justly with the public. Some railroad officials are quoted as objecting to it; that it is a return to the barbarous methods of the dark ages; that under it a man may be compelled to go on the witness stand and then and there brand himself as a felon, incurring thereby the contempt of the community, apart from any question of punishment by the court. They say this is an abridgment of the constitutional privilege of the citizen, but if it be his constitutional privilege to commit felony it at least is a constitutional right of other citizens to know of such things and visit with contempt where the law may not formally punish. It will be well if the decision by the Supreme Court puts a stop to the commission of these felonies by common carriers, though it may be feared that it will not entirely abolish the favoritism to the few which is a rank injustice to the many.

Ever since war talk began numerous predictions as to its results have been made by the military engineers of the daily press. All that we have read were interesting, but none seem to have approached in scientific accuracy that of a New York man who writes to the Evening Post. This engineer lays down the broad proposition that in a modern naval war, as every international conflict in these days is bound to be, the nation having the largest number of ships is certain to triumph. As England at present has nearly twice as many ships as any other country in the world it is impossible to lick her. This writer gives some facts to prove that in nine out of every ten naval engagements between modern armored vessels all the combatants on both sides are certain to be sunk. It may happen occasionally that two vessels will meet under such circumstances that one may escape, but the chances are always in favor of each getting in one good shot which will sink the other. Certainly in all combats where more than one ship is engaged some on both sides are sure to go to the bottom. This for the reason, he says, that the modern ironclad can stand but little damage, and in a helter skelter fight some effective shots are certain to be made. This writer, therefore, argues that if, as he attempts to prove, modern naval battles will be merely battles of extermination, the nation having the largest number of ships is certain to finally wind up as mistress of the seas. That is to say, England's navy can stand the loss of more ships than any other country possesses, and still be in good fighting condition. From the standpoint of this argument Germany could not hold out against Great Britain six months.

Wafers of Gold and Silver.

The time-honored custom of showering rice upon the departing bride and groom has its painful side. Many young couples have begun their honeymoon in actual physical pain, thanks to the stony grains which have stung their eyes and ears and found their way into their clothes and down their necks. Worse disasters than this are on record. Horses have taken fright at the reckless showering of these grains, and this, in some cases, has led to the overturning of the carriage and severe injury of its occupants. Attempts have occasionally been made to mend this state of affairs, but until lately nothing has taken the place of rice. The problem is at last solved, however. At a recent double wedding confetti was used as a substitute for the offending rice. For the benefit of such readers as are unacquainted with confetti, I may describe them as tiny paper wafers, principally gold and silver, with a few colored ones intermixed by way of adding to the effect. The progress of each bride down the staircase to the carriage on this particular occasion was made in a shower of gold and silver—surely quite as good an omen for her future prosperity as could possibly be afforded by the prosaic grains of rice. The effect of the myriads of sparkling confetti was absolutely charming and fairy-like as they fluttered to the ground, the sun catching them as they fell. Certainly they clung about the dresses of the newly married couples, but they did no harm, and were soon shaken off. In the house, as they fell on the floral decorations and sparkled among the roses and ferns, they produced a result that is well worthy of note by those whose business it is to provide novelties for functions of this sort. As for the horses, they were sublimely unconscious of the tiny gold and silver pieces with which their backs had been sprinkled by the time they started.

Literature and Pedagogy.

There are really only two things the successful teacher needs to have—knowledge of his subject-matter and knowledge of his pupils. The first of these can be gained only by study, the second only by experience. The man who has never been a real child himself cannot effectively teach children; and he who does not know by experience the warm-hearted, exuberant gaiety of school and college boys cannot successfully teach them. Furthermore, the teacher who spends more time on the method of teaching literature than on literature itself is sure to come to grief. Greatest of all forces is the personality of the instructor; nothing in the teaching is so effective as this; nothing is so instantly recognized and responded to by pupils; and nothing is more neglected by those who insist that teaching is a science rather than an art. After hearing a convention of very serious pedagogues discuss educational methods, in which they use all sorts of technical phraseology, one feels like applying Gladstone's cablegram, "Only common sense required."—The Century.

Perpetual Sunshine.

This occurs on the coast of Peru, where, although it may perhaps be misty occasionally, the blue sky is always visible through this whitish veil. Perpetual sunshine, when the sun is above the horizon, also exists in the Sahara, the great desert of Africa, and in the other rainless regions of the earth—namely, the high lands of Iran, various tracts of Turkestan and China, the plateau of Gobi, and also in Australia, between the southern colonies and the Gulf of Carpentaria. Should clouds appear in any of these districts the heat of the sun is so intense that they are dispersed almost before they have formed.

POLITICS OF THE DAY

MC KINLEY THE CANDIDATE.

The probability that Maj. McKinley will be the Republican nominee for President gives sincere pleasure to all Democrats. No other candidate stands so clearly for the odious policy of protection, nor would any other Republican leader incur the same deep-rooted hostility which the American people showed toward the author of the tariff law of 1890. Viewed in the light of past history there is every reason why the Democrats should welcome the choice of the Ohio Major as the standard-bearer of the party of trusts and monopolies.

Six years ago the tariff bill, to which the accident of his selection as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means fastened Mr. McKinley's name, was passed through Congress. The new measure was extolled as the embodiment of all protection wisdom and wonderful results of prosperity and political success were predicted by its friends. Both prophecies were doomed to signal failure.

Instead of becoming more prosperous the country began to show signs of business depression. Prices of goods advanced, and with dearer goods consumers could not afford to buy as much as formerly, so manufacturers found the demands for their products decreasing. The people grumbled because they had to pay higher prices, and wherever it was possible they bought less. Thus instead of a business boom the McKinley law brought decreased consumption, the first step toward industrial stagnation.

The political results of the new tariff were no less discouraging to the protectionists. In the fall elections, held the same year in which it was passed, a House of Representatives was elected in which there were only eighty-seven Republicans. The Republicans lost the States of Connecticut, Nebraska, Indiana, Michigan, Rhode Island, Wisconsin and even the high-tariff stronghold of Pennsylvania. Kansas was carried by the Populists, and the States of Minnesota, Iowa and Mr. McKinley's own Ohio were carried by very narrow Republican majorities. In New York State only eleven Republican Representatives were elected as against eighteen in the preceding Congress, and in Ohio only seven Representatives instead of sixteen as before. Maj. McKinley was among the defeated candidates. This showed what the people thought of McKinleyism.

In 1891 there was a repetition of the Democratic victories in the various State elections. The Republicans who had been claiming that their defeat in 1890 was due to a failure on the part of the voters to understand the new tariff law began to invent other excuses. In 1892 the whole country was again called to vote on the square issue of the McKinley law versus tariff reform. The Republicans insisted that each vote for the Democratic candidates was a vote against protection. The Democrats accepted the issue and everywhere denounced the tariff of 1890 as a fraud and robbery. Once more the American people expressed their opinions in emphatic form by triumphantly electing a Democratic President, House and Senate. As the result of their swindling tariff scheme the Republicans lost control of the entire administration of the Federal Government.

These are the plain facts of recent history. What reason is there for supposing that the policy of McKinleyism, so obnoxious in 1890, 1891 and 1892, will be regarded with more favor in 1896?

Has Earned His Hire.

Republican anti-McKinley organs are indignant at the lavish use of money in behalf of protection's candidate. The country, they think, is menaced with a new danger and they are warning the Republican party to beware.

There is nothing new in the situation, unless it is that new hands are distributing the funds. McKinley has earned all and more than the barons of protection will expend in his behalf.

They are supplying him with money from the motive which has always led them to equip the Republican party.

As long as this fund was utilized for the defeat of Democrats the organs of Allison, Reed and Morton saw nothing censurable in it. Only a short while ago these same organs now berating the manufacturers were advancing arguments to prove that Republicans who grow rich off the tariff were not only justified in making large campaign contributions, but should be applauded for their patriotism.

McKinley is now getting the boodle because he will give the barons more for their money than the other candidates. He will be nominated in June because he is the logical candidate of a party which has been supported by the men whom it has enriched at the expense of the people.

Clarkson, Platt and Quay are, after all, only sub-bosses. The real bosses are the protection barons, who will use any one or all the little bosses if it becomes necessary to do so in order to nominate McKinley.

Surely the laborer is worthy of his hire.—St. Louis Republic.

Did McKinley's Tariff Make You Rich?

Major McKinley's high taxation scheme for making everybody wealthy by taxing everything they used, was in full operation for four years. It certainly had a fair trial, and there is no doubt but that it enriched a few protected trusts and monopolies. But did it make the millions of farmers rich? Did the workingmen in the mills, factories and mines become capitalists through a policy which increased the cost of the goods they used?

It would be only fair that at the coming elections the votes of eleven million citizens should be cast in proportion to benefits received. Those who were made rich by McKinleyism should vote the Republican ticket. All the rest should support the Democratic candidates. Did protection make you rich?

New Southern Cotton Mills.

President Dwight, of the Nashua Manufacturing Company, Nashua, N. H., recently visited Cordova, Ala., and selected a site on which his company will at once erect a $600,000 cotton mill. The new factory will be the largest of its kind in Alabama, and will be equipped with all the latest and best improvements in machinery.

Calamity-croaking McKinleyites will please take notice that their efforts to scare business men from undertaking new enterprises are not meeting with much success. Lying stories of industrial ruin caused by low tariff taxes are of little weight when compared with one fact such as the above.

The Latest Protection Scarecrow.

Senator Cushman K. Davis, of Minnesota, has joined the McKinleyites, who are trying to scare the American people into voting for protection by holding up the alleged danger of the competition of cheap Japanese goods. In a telegram sent to the Republican convention of his State Senator Davis urged the adoption of a high-tariff platform for the special purpose of shutting out the low-priced products of Japan. The Minnesota Republicans have never been in favor of high protection, Senator Knute Nelson having voted for the Mills bill when he was a member of the House, but in response to Senator Davis' appeal they put themselves on record as favoring the policy which has done so much to impoverish the farmers of their State.

That the men who four years ago howled for protection against the pauper labor of Europe are now using Japan and China as an excuse for heavier taxation on imports is an encouraging sign. It shows that they realize that the European cheap-goods scare is played out, and that a new dodge must be worked. But their anti-Japanese campaignery has no better foundation than that of 1892. Its sham is exposed in a recent statement issued by Joseph Nimmo, Jr., a Republican, who was formerly chief of the United States Treasury Bureau of Statistics, who says:

"The value of our trade with China and Japan, as compared with certain other countries for the year ended June 30, 1894, was: China and Japan, $51,513,149; Great Britain, France and Germany, $803,042,815.

"In connection with this it is also of interest to advert to the total value of our foreign commerce, and to the total value of our internal commerce. The total value of the foreign commerce of the United States during the year ended June 30, 1894, was $1,547,135,194. It is impossible to state with any degree of accuracy the value of the internal commerce of the United States, but from all we know it appears safe to say that it amounts to fully $25,000,000,000 annually. How absurd, then, to attempt to delude the people of this country with the idea that our trade relations with China and Japan constitute a governing condition of a total commerce fully 500 times as great.

"To assume that American farmers, miners, manufacturers and industrial workers can be reduced to the level of Chinese coolies by a trade of such comparatively insignificant proportions, and consisting, in so far as relates to imports, almost exclusively of tea, silk and other commodities not produced in this country, and which, therefore, does not compete with American farmers, miners, manufacturers and industrial workers, is a vagary too absurd for serious consideration, even in the conflicts of partisan warfare."

This testimony of an eminent Republican should be conclusive reply to the absurd stories of the threatened flood of cheap goods from China and Japan which are being spread through the country by the McKinleyite orators and press. The so-called "Japanese danger" is merely a fake devised for political purposes. It should not mislead a single voter into supporting the party of high taxation.

Higher Wages for Miners.

The companies operating the coal mines in the Clearfield, Beech Creek, Cambria and Gallitzen coal regions, Pennsylvania, have posted notices that on and after April 1 the employes of all the mines will be paid 45 cents per ton for mining. Day labor will receive the same rates as when this price for mining was formerly paid. The new rates mean an advance to miners of 12½ per cent. over the wages paid in 1893, and to the day laborers of at least 10 per cent. Several thousand men will be affected.

American wage-workers are familiar with the history of wage reductions in the coal regions during the last two years that the McKinley law was in operation. Yet in spite of the fact that the companies were everywhere cutting down the wages of their miners, the agents of the coal trust in Congress declared that the McKinley tariff of 75 cents per ton on coal was necessary in order to keep wages up.

Since the Wilson law lowered the coal duty about 50 per cent. there has been a general advance of wages in all the important collieries, that above recorded bringing the number of miners who have received increased pay up to nearly 50,000. And this is only a sample of the ways in which wages have been increased through the revival in industry which followed the repeal of the McKinley bill.

What Was Done with the Wool?

A tariff-mongering organ in Boston asserts that "the worst injury" which the Wilson tariff has inflicted upon the woolen manufacturers of this country is in "compelling" them "to turn their attention to the manufacture of low stock and the production of cheap and inferior fabrics to compete with the shoddy goods sent in such huge quantities from abroad." There is not an honest and intelligent manufacturer who will indorse this assertion. The best answer to it is in the enormous importations of the finest fleeces which formerly found their way in extremely small quantities to this country. What use do American manufacturers make of all this fine wool, if they do not convert it into fine fabrics to clothe the American people? Do they eat it, or do they let it lie idle for the consumption of moths in the warehouses of importers?—Philadelphia Record.

RICHEST MAN IN THE WORLD.

The Duke of Westminster Is Awarded that Distinction.

His grace the Duke of Westminster, honest man, sleeps easily. Though his children number some seven living, and he has grandchildren too many to be reckoned readily, yet he has no fear for the morrow. The duke is probably the richest man in the world. Li Hung Chang has been rated higher, and Americans in their pride claim greater wealth for Mr. Rockefeller, but, everything considered, the Duke of Westminster's holdings will doubtless top those of the Chinaman and the American. He is certainly the heaviest owner of real estate in the world. There is considerable uncertainty as to the title of property in China. It is the subject's to-day; it may be the emperor's or it may be parceled out among other citizens to-morrow. Mr. Rockefeller's is largely in stocks and securities. The duke's is principally real estate. Its value and earnings are little affected by outside causes. For a century indeed the only variation has been an increase of value and rentals. The duke is interested in many commercial enterprises and railway and other corporations, but, as was said, the bulk of his belongings is in the nature of real estate, business blocks, market places, houses and farms. His income ranges from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 annually. It is not so great as that of several Americans, whose aggregate wealth is much less than that of Westminster, but if their returns are larger their risk is greater. The duke's belongings, real and personal, amount to about $175,000,000.

DUKE OF WESTMINSTER.

EATON HALL, HOME OF THE DUKE OF WESTMINSTER.

The duke's popularity is as great as his wealth. If his position were elective and he were to resign, he would be returned again at the next election. He is a truly democratic peer—making the true distinction between democracy and the vulgarity and viciousness of Aylesford, Queensberry and other notorious aristocrats dead and alive. He is beloved of his tenantry and admired by people of all classes whether they are his dependants or otherwise. His popularity was not gained in politics or in diplomacy, but from association. His hospitality is boundless and his many ancestral seats are always filled with guests. The fire is alight the year round. It is in the hunting field that his grace finds greatest joy. He is a true sportsman, and is careless whether farmers or princes accompany him in the chase. It is the game he seeks, not society. He is the best judge of a horse in the United Kingdom, and is not wholly theoretical in his information. He can fit a racing plate to a horse's foot with the skill of a master smith. His horses are the pride of his life. His stud farm is the estate on which his principal country seat, Eaton Hall, is situated. This is in Chester, near Hawarden, the home of Gladstone. The lords of the stud are the great Ben d'Or and Ormonde.

The duke, who describes himself as being in the prime of life, was born October 18, 1825, and is now in his seventy-first year. He has been married twice, the first time in 1852. His wife was Lady Constance Gertrude Leweson-Gower, daughter of George Granville, duke of Sutherland. They had eleven children, of whom six are now living. The first duchess died in 1880, and in 1883 the duke married Katherine Caroline Cavendish, daughter of Lord Chesham. They have three children.

In discussing the democratic ways of the duke Englishmen relate the story of a stranger who desired to see the art treasures of Eaton Hall. He met an elderly man walking about the grounds, and from his dress, which was a semihunting costume and not too new, thought the man to be a retainer of the duke. The stranger asked the man to show him about the place, which the person did, pointing out, explaining and listening to the visitor's comments on the duke and the family with interest and received with thanks a half sovereign to requite him for his trouble. The following day the visitor rode out to the hunt and in the master of the hounds, who was also lord lieutenant of the county and Duke of Westminster, he recognized his guide of the day before. It is explained by the enthusiastic fellow countrymen of the duke that the reason the great man did not decline the "tip" given him by the visitor was his fear of disconcerting the stranger. It would have been so utterly out of character for an English servant to decline money that the peer would have been obliged to disclose his identity to explain his refusal.

The Tourah Prison.

The chief prison in Egypt for male hard labor convicts is at Tourah, about eight miles south of Cairo, where the adjacent quarries, which once furnished limestone to the builders of the great Pyramids, supply unlimited scope for labor six days a week. There are nine hundred and fifty convicts, and though one hundred of them are "lifers," there are others whose term is only for six months. Strict discipline is maintained by sixty-five warders, who are unarmed and do not carry even a stick or whip; but by night there are nine sentries and by day there are four, who patrol the roof and the outside of the prison, and who know how to use their loaded rifles with deadly aim. These sentries are blacks from the equatorial provinces, and have prevented more than one attempted escape. Nearly all the convicts are natives of Egypt, the blacks only supplying five per thousand and the Nubians averaging only two per thousand. Any extra bad characters among the convicts, such as the ringleaders of attempted revolt or escape, are locked up at night in solitary cells to lessen their chances of contaminating their fellows.

As a whole, the convicts are by no means of a ruffianly type, and their physiognomies are very like those of the ordinary peasant. In this country, where crime is at such a minimum and where even the lunatics are as quiet as sheep, it is not too much to hope that education and improved environment may one day do much to improve the lot of the townfolk, from whom the convicts are mostly drawn. The "ticket-of-leave" system has not yet been introduced into Egypt, and would certainly be worth a trial, for at present there is very little incentive to well-conducted convicts to lead a peaceful, hard-working life within the prison bonds. Every visitor cannot fail to be struck with the very healthy, well-fed appearance of the prisoners, and on inquiry I was told that there were only fourteen on the sick list.

At the Right Moment.

What Thackeray called "belated wit" is worthless wit, no matter how delicate its quality, while the right thing said at the right moment for its saying may have the greatest practical value. An illustration of this activity of mind and the happy results is given by Chas. K. Tuckerman in his "Personal Recollections of Notable People:"

I was once, when a small boy, packed in a dense crowd at a political meeting in Faneuil Hall when Webster held forth, and I came near being crushed to death—a pigmy among giants—as the standing multitude within the hall, pressed by those who were endeavoring to enter from without, began to sway to and fro, a solid mass of human bodies, as helpless to counteract the movement as if Faneuil Hall, the "Cradle of Liberty," was being rocked by an earthquake.

The orator was in the midst of a stirring appeal, urging the necessity for individual exertion and unflinching patriotism to avert the dangers that threatened the political party whose principles he espoused, when he perceived the terrible sway of the packed assembly and the imminent danger that might ensue.

Webster stopped short in the middle of a sentence, advanced to the edge of the platform, and in a stentorian voice of command cried out, "Let each man stand firm!"

The effect was instantaneous. Each man stood firm; the great, heaving mass of humanity regained its equilibrium, and save the long breath of relief that filled the air, perfect stillness ensued.

"That," exclaimed the great orator, "is what we call self-government!"—so apt an illustration of the principle he was expounding that the vast assembly responded with deafening cheers.

What She Said.

DUMAS AND GOLDSMITH.

The Points of Resemblance Between the Two Writers.

Dumas the elder had not a few points of resemblance to Oliver Goldsmith. He could not help running into debt, giving alms largely to every one who demanded them without stopping to inquire whether the mendicant were an impostor or an honest man, being a prey to sharp dealers and parasites, and living from hand to mouth. He was also boastful, from a fear of being forgotten or underrated, though without a grain of envy in his genial soul; was fond of the excitement and adventures of the old-fashioned modes of traveling; and had an undying love for the place in which he spent his youth.

Throughout his long and varied literary career he nursed the hope of ending his days in the forest-girdled town of Villers-Cotterets, in the ancient province of Valois, where he was born and reared. If ever the thought of saving any of his earnings traversed his brain, the father to it was his lifelong desire "to there return, and die at home at last." He often talked of buying, when he had the means, the house in the Rue de Lormier in which he was born as day dawned on a July morning, in the second year of this century. Villers-Cotterets was written on his heart, and reacted on most of his after-life impressions. When he revisited the town he was lionized by great and small, and found that boyish escapades and venial sins of adolescence were still held in kindly remembrance by the old folks.

Dumas was a man of warm and ready sympathies, jovial of temperament, and sparkling with ready wit. His impressions were vivacious, the fountains were near his eyes, and after laughing and crying, or rather blubbering, for sheer joy at the welcome he received, he lent himself to convivial demonstrations, and delighted all who sat down with him at table by his high spirits and the brilliancy of his conversation.—Century.

Bench and Bar.

The Ruling Spirit Strong.

The prosecuting attorney of a North Missouri county and a young attorney noted for his persistence were recently trying the preliminary hearing of a criminal case before a justice of the peace. The young attorney asked many irrelevant and incompetent questions, and when the prosecuting attorney would object would always say:

"Your honor, before you pass on that objection I want to argue it."

Finally the young man asked the same question the seventh time against the prosecuting attorney's objection, when the prosecutor, losing his patience, said in a loud aside:

"——, are you never going to get over being a confounded fool?"

Whereupon the young fellow jumped up wth his usual remark:

"Your honor, before you pass on that I want to argue it."

Interruptions by the Court.

Lord Chief Justice Erle was prone to interrupt counsel when it was found that the judges had already made up their minds against him. On one occasion Mr. Bovill, Q. C., soon afterward made a judge, was stopped with: "Here we stand, we four men, and we have all firmly (emphasizing the adverb) made up our minds that there must be a new trial; but if you think it worth your while going on after that (playfully), why of course we'll keep on hearing you." Whereupon the Q. C. laughingly sat down.

On another occasion he again interrupted with "I beg to inform the counsel 'there is a time in the mind of every man at which he lets down the flood-gates of his understanding, and allows not one more drop to enter;' and that time in my mind has fully arrived."

The Judge's Little Joke.

Judge Gary has a dry wit with him that is occasionally the cause of his grim court-room being pervaded by a very audible tittering. The other day, says the Green Bag, one of the attorneys was airing his indignation. He had been robbed. Yes, sir, robbed. It was shameful the way things went right there under the eyes of the law.

Finally Judge Gary noticed the fuming and fretting one.

"What's the matter now?" he asked.

"Matter? It's a confounded outrage. Had my overcoat stolen right from this room."

The judge smiled a little.

"Overcoat, eh?" he said. "Pah, that's nothing. Whole suits are lost here every day."

Paid the Damages.

A Western judge, sitting in chambers, seeing from the piles of papers in the lawyers' hands that the first case was likely to be hotly contested, asked: "What is the amount in question?" "Two dollars," said the plaintiff's counsel. "I'll pay it," said the judge, handing over the money; "call the next case." He had not the patience of Sir William Grant, who, after listening for two days to the arguments as to the construction of a certain act, quietly observed when they had done: "That act has been repealed."

THE STUDIOUS GIRL.

AN INTERESTING LETTER FROM A YOUNG LADIES' COLLEGE.

Race Between the Sexes for Education. Health Impaired by Incessant Study.

The race between the sexes for education is to-day very close.

Ambitious girls work incessantly over their studies, and are often brought to a halt, through having sacrificed the physical to the mental. Then begin those ailments that must be removed at once, or they will produce constant suffering. Headache, dizziness, faintness, slight vertigo, pains in the back and loins, irregularity, loss of sleep and appetite, nervousness and blues, with lack of confidence; these are positive signs that women's arch enemy is at hand.

The following letter was received by Mrs. Pinkham in May, one month after the young lady had first written, giving symptoms, and asking advice. She was ill and in great distress of mind, feeling she would not hold out till graduation, and the doctor had advised her to go home.

——— College, Mass.

You dear Woman:—

I should have written to you before, but you said wait a month. We are taught that the days of miracles are past. Pray what is my case? I have taken the Vegetable Compound faithfully, and obeyed you implicitly and, am free from all my ills. I was a very, very sick girl. Am keeping well up in my class, and hope to do you and myself credit at graduation. * * My gratitude cannot find expression in words. Your sincere friend, MARY ———

P. S. Some of the other girls are now using the Compound. It benefits them all.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the only safe, sure and effectual remedy in such cases, as it removes the cause, purifies and invigorates the system, and gives energy and vitality.

The Greatest Medical Discovery of the Age.

KENNEDY'S MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

DONALD KENNEDY, OF ROXBURY, MASS.,

Has discovered in one of our common pasture weeds a remedy that cures every kind of Humor, from the worst Scrofula down to a common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both thunder humor). He has now in his possession over two hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston. Send postal card for book.

A benefit is always experienced from the first bottle, and a perfect cure is warranted when the right quantity is taken.

When the lungs are affected it causes shooting pains, like needles passing through them; the same with the Liver or Bowels. This is caused by the ducts being stopped, and always disappears in a week after taking it. Read the label.

If the stomach is foul or bilious it will cause squeamish feelings at first.

No change of diet ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it. Dose, one tablespoonful in water at bedtime. Sold by all Druggists

One as good as another.

It is easy to say that one preparation is as good as another, and it is easy to waste money by buying something you know nothing about—and receiving no benefit. When the body is weak and you want to give it strength, when health is failing, what wisdom is there in experimenting with a substitute, when for a few cents more you can buy the original article? For more than twenty years Scott's Emulsion has been the standard Cod-liver Oil emulsion. It contains more pure Norwegian Cod-liver Oil than any other emulsion in the world, and will stand the test of time as being a perfect, inseparable emulsion. You can't afford to take a substitute for it.

NATIONAL SOLONS.

REVIEW OF THEIR WORK AT WASHINGTON.

Detailed Proceedings of Senate and House—Bills Passed or Introduced in Either Branch—Questions of Moment to the Country at Large.

The Legislative Grind.

The Senate indulged in an acrimonious political debate Friday. The controversy arose over Mr. Hill's motion to strike from the legislative appropriation bill the proposed change of the date of assembling the New Mexico Legislature from December to May. Mr. Hill bitterly denounced the change as a political trick. Mr. Elkins protested. The debate took a wide range, Senators Gorman, Faulkner, Cockrell and other Democrats attacking the provision as political, while Senators Elkins, Carter, Cullom and other Republican Senators defended it. Mr. Cullom sought to table Mr. Hill's motion, but a motion to this effect failed by a vote of 21 to 29, whereupon Mr. Cullom yielded to the Hill motion and the New Mexico provision was struck out. The Senate passed the legislative appropriation bill, carrying $21,500,000. Aside from providing the usual appropriations, the bill is important in effecting a reform of the system of compensation for United States District Attorneys and Marshals, salaries being substituted for fees. The appropriation committee attempted to take up the sundry civil appropriation bill in the House, but the members who were interested in bills on the private calendar defeated them by a vote of 142 to 77.

The Senate Monday passed the bill appropriating $2,000,000 for a public building at Indianapolis. Much time was spent in discussing the settlement between Government and the State of Arkansas. The House took up the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill and disposed of fifteen of the 100 pages before adjournment. Few amendments were added to the bill. The Senate resolution authorizing F. Green to exercise the duties and powers heretofore conferred upon the late Gen. Casey in relation to the construction of the library of Congress was adopted. The Senate resolution authorizing ex-President Harrison to accept certain medals presented to him by the Governments of Brazil and Spain was also adopted.

The House spent Tuesday considering the sundry civil bill and fair progress was made. Effort was made by some of the Southern representatives to strike out the appropriation of $50,000 for the pay of internal revenue informers, but it was unsuccessful. The expected debate on the resolution for a Senate inquiry into recent bond issues did not take place, as Mr. Peffer gave notice that he would defer his motion. The postoffice appropriation bill, carrying $93,000,000, was considered in part, but not completed. A sharp debate on mail subsidies arose, Mr. Vilas opposing an extension of the subsidy system, while Senators Perkins and White of California upheld them. Senator George's speech in opposition to Mr. Dupont's claim to a seat occupied most of the day and was not completed.

Ocean mail subsidies brought on an animated discussion in the Senate Wednesday during the consideration of the postoffice appropriation bill. Mr. Vilas opposed subsidies, and pointed out many instances of what he declared were excessive payments for mail service. Mr. Perkins of California energetically defended the subsidies for their encouragement to American shipping. The subsidy item was reserved for a separate vote. The balance of the postoffice appropriation bill was completed. Senator Call of Florida introduced in the Senate a joint resolution directing the sending of an adequate naval force to Cuba to put an end to barbarities and the violation of treaty obligations. The House continued consideration of the sundry civil bill.

The House Thursday passed the sundry civil bill, and wasted a lot of time in acrimonious debate of the question of appropriating public money for private or sectarian institutions. The postoffice appropriation bill served to bring out some sharp discussion in the Senate on the propriety of abolishing country postoffices and absorbing them as branches of city offices. The bill authorizing the lighthouse board to proceed with the building of the lighthouse at North Manitou island, Lake Michigan, was passed. The House bill granting the Atchison and Nebraska and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railways a right of way through the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indian reservations in Kansas and Nebraska was passed. The Senate then went into executive session and soon after adjourned until Monday.

Western Hospitality.

People in the Eastern cities know not the meaning of the word "hospitality" as it is written in the dictionary of the Western ranchman.

"Why," said Senator Warren, of Wyoming, discussing some of the characteristics of the Western people, with a representative of the Washington Post the other day, "I would regard it as a personal insult if I went to a house on any ranch and found the door locked. The first impulse of the average Western man on such an occasion would be to break the door down."

"But how about locking up when the inmates go away?"

Senator Warren laughed. "It would make no difference at all," he said. "We all go on the general supposition that a man traveling through the country is hungry. If he has any food in his haversack, and finds nobody at home, he goes in the house, takes possession of the kitchen, and cooks his meal. If he has nothing, he helps himself to what he can find. He does it as a matter of course, and the family would feel that he was worse than a dude if he declined to share with them even the smallest bit of food that they happened to have in store."

A Curious Barometer.

One of the most curious of the many natural barometers consists of a half-pint glass half full of water, a piece of muslin and a leech. The leech must be put in the water and the muslin tied over the top of the glass so that the creature cannot get out again. When fine weather is to be the order of the day the leech will remain at the bottom of the water, coiled up in spiral shape, perfectly motionless. If rain is to be expected it will creep to the top of the glass and remain there until there is a likelihood of more settled weather. If there is to be a storm of wind it squirms about in the water with violence. For some days before thunder it occasionally moves its body in a convulsive fashion. In frosty weather it behaves in the same manner as in fine weather, and it foretells snow in the same manner that it does rain.

A MOTORMAN'S LIFE.

FULL OF HARDSHIPS, EXPOSURE AND CONSTANT DANGER.

The Great Strain on a Man's Nerves Sufficient in Itself to Wreck Him in a Short Time—The Experience of a Well-known Motorman.

From the Cincinnati, Ohio, Enquirer.

The life of a motorman is not a bed of roses. He is subjected to many hardships especially in the winter, when he is exposed to the cold and snow. Even in the summer he must bear the intense heat which beats down upon him. Considerable nerve and self-possession is necessary in a good motorman, for the lives and limbs of his passengers are at stake. One of the best-known electric motormen in this city is William Frazer, who is at present running a car on the Cumminsville electric line. He is not only well known to his fellow employes, but to the people who travel on his car. Mr. Frazer is a young man about twenty-six years of age and resides with his wife and child at 144 Betts street, Cincinnati, O. About a year ago Mr. Frazer was taken with serious stomach troubles. He bought several kinds of medicine which were recommended to him, but none of them seemed to give him even temporary benefit. An enthusiastic admirer of that famous remedy known as Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People told him to try them. Frazer was almost discouraged, but took the advice. To a reporter of the Enquirer he said:

"I can most heartily recommend Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. They are all that is claimed for them, in fact they advertise themselves better than any medicine I ever saw. I was seized some time ago with a bad attack of indigestion. My stomach hurt me nearly all the time and I could not digest my food. The pain was almost unbearable and I found nothing that would give me relief. I confess that when I bought the first box of Pink Pills I hadn't much confidence in their efficacy, because I had tried so many things without success that I was almost discouraged. Before I had taken one box I was decidedly better. Two boxes cured me entirely. While I have been under the weather from other causes my indigestion has never returned. If it ever should I know just what to do. I have so much confidence in the efficacy of Pink Pills that if I ever get real sick again with any disorder I shall use some of them. It is a pleasure for me, I assure you, to testify to the excellent qualities of these Pink Pills. They not only tone the stomach but regulate the bowels and act as a mild cathartic."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills contain all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are sold in boxes, at 50 cents a box, or six boxes for $2.50, and may be had of all druggists or directly by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y.

Triplets in Congress.

Three members of the House are so much alike in personal appearance and dress that they are often mistaken for each other and could readily pass for three brothers. Their names are Monroe H. Kulp of Shamokin, Pa., George B. McClellan of New York City, and John Simpkins of Yarmouth, Mass., who enjoys the distinction of being one of the wealthiest Congressmen at Washington. Messrs. Kulp and Simpkins are Republicans, while McClellan is a Democrat. All three are heavy built, stocky young fellows, without a vestige of hair on their faces. In addition to looking so much alike in stature and facial appearance, the "triplets," as their colleagues call them, dress alike, and it is often difficult to distinguish one from the other.

Car Warming.

Experiments for warming passenger cars by a stove, which is placed outside, have been tried on some French railways. It is said that a single stove is sufficient for a whole car, and that the expenses are very small indeed, twenty-six pounds of coal keeping up the fire for about 200 miles. The warmed air circulates inside the car.

A Great Investment.

The Gold Stock Trading Co., of 35 and 37 Broadway, New York, have just declared a monthly bonus of 15 per cent. in addition to the regular dividends of 20 per cent. This is a remarkable showing. The company trades in Gold Mining and other shares and have reliable inside information on these securities. Some of their stocks have advanced from 600 to 1800 per cent. in value and others are in line for large advances. Investments are accepted of $20 to $1,000 and certificates are issued for the amount with 8 dividend coupons attached like a United States bond. The New York Financial Record, of March 18, one of the leading monetary organs of the United States, speaking of this company says: "The conservative management and high character of the directorate invite the cordial support of all investors desiring safe and large returns for small capital." With this endorsement our readers will do well to correspond with the Company and obtain their prospectus and further particulars with a view to profitable business.

GOLD AT CRIPPLE CREEK.

And the Best Way to Get There Is Over the Santa Fe Route.

The fabulously rich gold mining district of Cripple Creek, Colo., is attracting hundreds of people. By spring the rush bids fair to be enormous. That there is an abundance of gold there is demonstrated beyond doubt.

To reach Cripple Creek, take the Santa Fe Route from Chicago or Kansas City. The only standard gauge line direct to the camp. Through pullman sleepers and free chair cars. The Santa Fe lands you right in the heart of Cripple Creek.

Baboon Switch-Tender.

The statement of a traveler, made some months ago, that a baboon was acting as a switch-tender on one of the railroads of South Africa, was received with incredulity by most American readers, as a traveler's yarn.

Letters of inquiry, however, have elicited a confirmation of the story with some explanatory facts.

The baboon, a powerful animal 8 or 10 years old, nicknamed Ceese, was the property, or pet, of a native switchman, who surreptitiously taught him to turn the switch points while his master sat at his box door and looked on.

Ceese soon evinced a well-nigh perfect intelligence in the matter, and after a few days came to do the work quite as well as a man, even to the locking of the rod and other details.

The engine-drivers did not object to his ministrations, and came to have full confidence in his efficiency. When the shifting engine, which moved cars about the yard, passed, the baboon would often hop on the cowcatcher and enjoy a short ride, after opening the switch for it, but promptly returned to his post. He appeared fully to understand the theory and practice of switching and shunting.

But after the story of Ceese's occupation got abroad, numerous patrons of the road raised an outcry against it, declaring that it was monstrous to place human life at the caprice of a brute. The superintendent was obliged to appease the popular indignation; and so, in railway phrase, Ceese was "bounced" from his "job."

Lawyers in Congress.

Of the 89 Senators now holding seats, 63 are lawyers. Of the 356 Representatives, 225 are lawyers. Tennessee's Senators and 10 Representatives are all lawyers. Of Ohio's 2 Senators and 21 Representatives, both of the former and 19 of the latter are lawyers. Texas has 2 lawyers in the Senate and 10 out of a positive 13 in the House. New York gets along with 1 lawyer in the Senate and 15 out of 34 in the House. Massachusetts has 2 lawyers in the the Senate and only 4 in the House, 9 of her Representatives being merchants and manufacturers. Maine has 2 lawyers to represent her in the Senate and 3 in the House, Capt. Boutelle being the only Representative she has who is not a lawyer. Mr. Dingley, however, has not practiced law for many years.

Needed a Double Baptism.

Mme. Leger, wife of a resident of Blanzy, near Autun, France, is the mother of a child of the female sex with two perfect heads and one body. The infant has excellent health and every chance of living. A strange feature of the case is that the parish priest has been ordered by ecclesiastical authority to perform a double ceremony of baptism.

Saved from Destruction.

This is what happens when the kidneys are rescued from inactivity by Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. If they continue inactive they are threatened with Bright's Disease, diabetes or some other malady which works their destruction. Malarial, bilious and rheumatic ailment and dyspepsia are also conquered by the Bitters, which is thorough and effective.

Mumming in England.

For several centuries "mumming" was a favorite amusement in England at the holiday season. Parties of mummers, wearing masks and fantastic attire, went about the streets singing songs, playing practical jokes, and claiming drink money from householders and people whom they met.

Spring Medicine
Your blood in Spring is almost certain to be full of impurities—the accumulation of the winter months. Bad ventilation of sleeping rooms, impure air in dwellings, factories and shops, over-eating, heavy, improper foods, failure of the kidneys and liver properly to do extra work thus thrust upon them, are the prime causes of this condition. It is of the utmost importance that you

RIPANS TABULES

A reporter called, on Wednesday evening, May 8, 1895, at the residence of Mr. William McMahon, No. 1688 Pearl street, Brooklyn Village (Cleveland), O., to learn, if possible the cause of the noticeable improvement in his physical condition over that of a year ago, when he was a sufferer from indigestion and various organic disorders. "You see," began Mr. McMahon, "to start with, my work—that of setting type at the case—allows me little chance for bodily exercise, and is altogether too confining for anybody who is in the least subject to indigestion or dyspepsia. Perhaps not more so than many another mechanic or artisan who is constantly indoors and under severe mental strain, while the physical development is sadly in need of something to keep it in trim. Well, that has been my complaint for years, and some months ago I became very bilious, and constipation made life miserable for me at times. Then it took a seat in my LIVER, which became noticeably inactive, and I became alarmed about it. The first thing I turned my attention to was to secure a 'liver regulator,' which, however, failed to regulate; next I sought relief in 'liver pills,' which so pained and griped me that the cure was, I thought, worse than the disease. The next thing I did was to throw away the whole "shooting match,' and resolve to take no more proprietary medicines. However, on hearing my tale of woe, one day, at the office, a fellow-workman offered me a small Tabule—Ripans, he called it—which, he said, he would guarantee to act on the liver. I took it under protest, expecting to be doubled up in about fifteen minutes with the 'gripes.' But I was agreeably surprised in its action. It was very gentle, and I resolved to try a box. Since then I have gradually noted an entire change in the working of my system, and think that Ripans Tabules are the best remedy for liver and stomach troubles this side of anywhere. They are really a substitute for physical exercise. Have one before you go?" And Mr. McMahon produced his box of "stand-bys" from his inside pocket as the reporter took his leave.

Ripans Tabules are sold by druggists, or by mail if the price (50 cents a box) is sent to The Ripans Chemical Company, No. 10 Spruce Street, New York. Sample vial, 10 cents.

Two medicines have done me so much good I cannot find words to express my gratitude for them. I was down with a complication of troubles, catarrh of the bowels and falling of the womb. For seven weeks I could not sit up. Two bottles of McElree's Wine of Cardui and one package of Thedford's Black-Draught cured me. I have recommended the Wine of Cardui Treatment to a number of suffering women, and not one has failed to find relief by its use. If I can do anything to help bring this good medicine to the attention of sufferers, I will be glad. MRS. E. C. ADAMS.

Printing Bids.

At their special session this week, of the Board of Commissioners, the contract for doing the county printing for one year was let, or rather a part of it was let, and an order was made as to how the rest is to be done. In brief, the arrangement is, that such work as cannot be done by home printers will be done by Burford, and all that can be done at home, must be given to printers in the county. In order to make this clear, we publish below the conditions of the offer made by Burford:

AUBURN IND., April 2, 1896.

To the Honorable Board of Commissioners of DeKalb county Indiana.

GENTLEMEN:

The contract for printing Blank Books, Blanks and Stationery between your Honorable Board and myself will expire the following June 1896. In view thereof, I hereby propose and agree to continue same upon the same terms and conditions as therein set forth except that I will waive the right to your Honorable Board to make such arrangement for the purchase of such supplies from the Printing establishments in DeKalb County as they can Manufacture or print in their places of business. I further agree that all goods of like character, which may from time to time be ordered from me will be charged and billed at the prices named in the contract now in force, regardless of any prices you make with your home printers. I further agree, that all articles furnished under this proposition shall be first-class in workmanship and material, equal in all respects to work of similar kind now in use in your respective county offices.

Respectfully Submitted,
WM. B. BURFORD,
By M. D. YONTZ Agt.

The Board being fuliy advised accepts the above proposition and orders the Auditor to make same together with this acceptance a part of the record of this day's proceedings.

Witness our hand in open court this 2nd day of April 1896.

JAMES M. HENDERSON, J. W. BATEMAN, ISAAC HAGUE — Com'issioners DeKalb County, Ind.

From the above statement it will be seen that all the large books, order books, books of receipts, and similar work will be done by Burford, but all blanks, and forms; letter heads, envelops, and other plain work must be given to home printers. Each county officer, will be required to give out the work needed in his office, and to whom he chooses. Thus a republican officer will divide his work up among the republican printing houses of the county, and the democratic officers, will divide theirs among the democratic printing houses. The year commences in June, and there will probably be found a good amount of many blanks already on hand in the various offices. But this would happen at any time the change was made. The arrangement is perhaps as nearly satisfactory as the Board could make, and it will now depend on the officers themselves as to how loyally they will carry this arrangement out. A similar arrangement was had at different times several years ago, but the most of the officers went right on giving their blanks to Burford, and the Board allowed the bills, leaving the home printers out in the cold. We trust it will not be so this time. The Board very properly, asks that printers come to an agreement on prices, so that different bills will not be brought in by different firms. If a job is worth a dollar it should be only a dollar, no matter who did the work. Just what action the other printers of the county will take we cannot say, but for ourself, we are in favor of agreeing on prices and not charging the county any more than we would charge anyone else. We have always done this, and it is the only right way. Let us meet the Board and county officers in this matter in a friendly spirit, and have an end of this contention about printing.

ANOTHER CURE.

AUBURN, IND., March 21, 1896.

Our little boy Eddie has always been sickly and puny and at times has had so much distress with his rupture, we thought he would die and so did his physician, who recommended us to take him to Dr. Casebeer for a cure. We did so, and he is now well after two treatments and growing fat and hearty. We are very much pleased with the Dr. and his treatment. 13-14

The Old Whaler.

Many of our people will remember the old whaling ship "Progress" that was at the World's Fair. It was brought from the seacoast, and up the St. Lawrence, around the Great Lakes and into Chicago river. Then it was taken down to the Worlds Fair grounds and run into a little inlet, near where the Intramural railway turned at its south loop. Here it was visited by multitudes of people, who realized that it was a relic of an industry of the past, for whaling, has for many years, been almost dead. On this old ship were shown all the old-style appliances used in catching whales and getting out the oil from them. Of course there were many of the later appliances used in the same industry. After the fair was over, the old ship was left at its anchorage, in the little pond of water, and there it is yet. We recently visited the World's Fair ground, now being rapidly changed into a lovely park. And there lay the old ship, looking as natural as life, though a little older and considerably weather beaten. The waters of the pond are more shallow now, owing probably to filling up by the washing in of rubbish and soil from the grounds around there. This causes the ship to lie in the mud, and she has tipped over to one side at quite an angle. She is nearer the shore also, and one can get on board by getting a plank up against her side. One would think the Park managers, would keep this old boat in repair, for as the years go by it will become more and more a curiosity as a relic of a lost industry. Ships and boats are common, of course. But old-time whale ships are not. The Progress was used in whaling voyages about fifty years.

Mrs. Whetsel.

Monday's Daily.

Mrs. Dora Whetsel, wife of W. J. Whetsel, who has been lying very sick at the home of her sister, Mrs R. Sawvel, for the past few months died at 6 o'clock last night. Her remains were taken to her home at Butler on the 1:37 Wabash to-day. There were brief services at the residence of Mr. Sawvel here to-day, by Mr. Walts, and she was taken to her home to await interment which will be Wednesday in the cemetery at Butler.

Farm Slid Away.

The Remarkable Misfortune of a Small Ranch Owner in California.

On the slope of the mountains on a branch of Elk creek one homesteader at least has lost his home and is now wondering whether the government will allow him, under the circumstances, to file another claim, says the San Francisco Examiner. Mr. Donohoe, county surveyor of Mendocino county, who lately returned from establishing some boundary lines near there, says:

"Some time since Fred Houx filed on a piece of land on a mesa on the south side of the stream and erected a cabin and made other improvements thereon. It has been his habit of late to make occasional trips to town, and it was during one of the late rains that he made his last trip. High water prevented his return and probably saved his life. Last winter was unusually severe, the rainfall being over fifty inches. The soil was thoroughly soaked and is of such nature that large patches frequently become loosened and slide down the mountains.

Mr. Houx as soon as possible returned to his claim, and when about a quarter of a mile from home the horse he was riding became very restless, and it was with difficulty he could urge it forward. The animal finally stopped commenced to tremble violently. On looking up Mr. Houx saw his cabin coming down the slope, and felt as though he, too, were going with it. The man described the sensation as though one were on a ship at sea.

"He immediately turned his horse back and raced for firmer land. Arriving at a safe distance, he looked back and saw the whole mountain slope moving down into the valley. At first the ground moved very slowly, like a glacier, but it constantly gathered speed and dashed over a precipice with a loud roar into the creek below, completely damming it, the stream being entirely dry below the dam for some hours.

"The house, three cows and several sheep were completely buried in the debris. The slide was about a quarter of a mile square and stripped the slope of soil."

Unfortunate People

are they who are afflicted with pimples boils carbuncles, running sores, ulcers, scrofula, cancerous or syphilitic affection o any blood taint whatsoever, and do not try a 50c. bottle of Foley's Sarsaparilla. Robbins & McCord. 14-18

The difficulty in Ft. Wayne labor circles proves to be not as bad as at first reported. The construction company, by its superintendent met with a mass meeting of the citizens, last Friday evening and there was a full explanation, showing that the reports circulated were false. The superintendent stated that not a man but five expert foremen had been brought from abroad, that 129 men were employed, and every one of them so far as he knew, was from the city: that out of nineteen foremen, fourteen were from Fott Wayne, that out of forty-six teams only thirteen belonged to the company. He said that no men had been discharged and that while some teams had been laid off pending the arrival of material, and owing to the condition of the weather, none had been discharged.

In that great audience there was not one man to qustion a word or a statement Mr. Childs made, proving conclusively that there was no ground whatever for the fake stories published by irresponsible persons for political effect.

Nervous Prostration

Cured by Dr. Miles' Nervine.

Prolonged derangement of the nervous system not only affects the brain and mental powers, but develops disease in some of the vital organs. The most dangerous of these indirect results is when the heart is affected. This was the case of the Rev. N. F. Surface, Fawn River, Mich., who writes under date of Feb. 14, 1895:

"Fourteen years ago I had a slight stroke of paralysis. Overwork brought on nervous prostration. I was exceedingly nervous and the exertion of public speaking caused heart palpitation that threatened my life. I used two bottles of Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure for my heart trouble, and two of Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine for my nervousness and feel better than I ever expected to feel again. I can speak for hours without tiring or having my heart flutter as it formerly did, and I have you to thank that I am alive today."

Katy Did.

The Albion New Era, in publishing some old reminiscences, calls up this good one:

It was during the lifetime and residence of Jacob Busz in Burr Oak that Mr. Petty (father of Wm. Petty at Rome City,) preached occasionally at the old log school house, and sought to convince the unconverted pioneer that he was on the wrong road. A good many were believers in the universal salvation of mankind. The meetings were well attended, and everybody, regardless of doctrinal views, assisted in the services—some by keeping the old fire place well supplied with logs, others in praying, and not a few assisted in rendering the sacred songs melodious and soul-inspiring. One evening the preacher "lined" the hymn for the congregation to sing. A pause ensued. Uncle Jaky Busz and his good wife Katy sat together. The muse of song was slow of spirit, and did not move; perhaps the meter was uncommon, or the hymn was new. Uncle Jaky had sung before, but Aunt Katy was always ready to assist him. He finally started the song without any particular reference to music, expecting as usual that his good wife would chime in and carry it through for him. But he was disappointed; and after a few efforts, completely broke down. He then turned to Katy in surprise, exclaiming: "D—n it, Katy why don't you sing!"

Brutal Murder?

Several School girls, on leaving the High School building late on Wednesday evening beheld a sight which froze the blood in their veins. A. S. Nake had been foully murderer and his now cold and lifeless body, thrown near the school house entrance. Being a stranger in Auburn, nothing further is known of him. Miss Stella Hague and Miss VanDoren, two teachers, were witnesses of terrible tragedy.

Alma May is supposed to be the criminal, although Miss VanDoren struck several blows. The body was lifted up gently on the end of a long stick, or perhaps several sticks, for none of the girls would touch the "horrid body," and a grave was dug in a quiet nook, and he was covered over with the clods of the valley. Ethel Ruffner was pall bearer, and Edith Hodge offered a prayer(!) and Nellie Franks took up "a collection to defray expenses." Other girls gathered about the sad scene and sobbed hysterically.

They buried him darkly, (T'was almost night)
The sod with their hair pins turning,
By the trembling moonbeams misty light,
And an X—ray dimly burning.

Slowly and sadly, they laid him down,
To the bottom he dropped—like a dropper,
They carved not a line, they raised not a stone,
But rushed up here and told us this whopper.

From Texas.

We are in receipt of a letter written by Mrs. Belle Dilgard at San Antonio, Texas, asking if we received the flowers we lately spoke of. It appears that they did not get our paper of the next week after receiving them. We assure our San Antonio friends that the lovely gift was highly appreciated. We quote also, a part of this letter. It says:

San Antonio is at present a beautiful flower garden. "Main Park" is filled with pansies, the most beautiful and wonderful I ever saw. There is every shade, from the whitest to the deepest black. "Travis Park" has little else than trees in every shade of bloom. "Alamo Plaza" is filled with roses of every kind imaginable. I am sure if you could be transferred from Auburn to San Antonio instantly und enexpectedly you would think you were in the midst of a dream of Paradise, providing you looked for nothing but the beautiful, for we do have some things in San-Antonio that are anything but beautiful—the 185 saloons for instance.

We are anticipating a grand time from the 14th to the 20th of April. The state convention of the Epworth League meets here. We expect 1,500 delegates and some say 3,000 visitors. The meetings will be held in "San Pedro Springs Park." I feel of some little importance myself, having been chosen at the last state convention of the W. C. T. U. as fraternal delegate to the Epworth League convention. Just imagine such an insignificant person as myself addressing such an audience! Well, it will be the very shortest possible, and those fraternal speeches are not expected to be lenghty. [We assure are friend, it is not such an unusual thing for DeKalb people to get honored places wherever they locate. And we feel sure that speech will be all right. DeKalb Hoosiers are never as much at home as when they are leading.—Ex.]

Graveyard Insurance

J. N. Davis, of Marcellus, Cass, Co. Mich., was here this week Wednesday, to settle up the funeral expenses of Mrs. Butler. He had insured both Mr. and Mrs Butler, in the Elkhart Graveyard Insurance company, and hopes to get at least part of his money back. He was an old neighbor of theirs when they were residents of Cass Co. Mich., and at the time the Elkhart Insurance company started up, he took out this insurance of $1000 on each of them. When Mr. Butler died a few years ago, he failed to get the loss properly adjusted, and found himself out of pocket about $350. It is not likely he will do much better now. He originally took out insurance on several other parties, but as with most of the dealings with that company, the matters did not prove satisfactory. We are sorry to say that a DeKalb man, Senator O. Z. Hubbell is said to have had an active interest in the company.

Surgical Operation.

The prisoner, Gaylor, had to undergo a surgical operation this forenoon, to relieve his wounded hand. It had swelled badly and pained him severely. He was put under the influence of chloroform and his hand cut open, and a great many pieces of broken bones removed. It is injured so as to affect the lower arm, and pus had collected about the wrist. This was relieved and a drainage tube put in. Dr. Hines did the work, assisted by Dr. Swarts and Dr. Baxter, while a number of other physicans including at least Dr. Stamets and Dr. Sebring were present. The operation was pretty severe, but he is a hard man to kill and will likely pull through his various dangers.

Queer Accident.

Cal. Husselman reports as queer an accident as we remember hearing. One of his farm hands, named Raub, was a few days ago fixing up some of the farming implements to get ready for spring work. He had a lot of the needed tools on the ground by him, and among the rest, was a small sized oil can. He went to kneel down to get at the work better, when his knee came down on the point of the oil can spout, the spout going into the leg so far that when he got up, it stuck fast and stood out alone from the leg. It was extracted at once, but he has been disabled since then with a lame leg. But except the temporary disability, he will not be a sufferer.

HORRIBLY MANGLED.

Rev. George Engleman On a B & O Train Which Killed a Man.

Rev George Engleman of the Reformed church was returning from Findlay, O., yesterday on the B. & O. train which reaches the Junction at about 4:30 in the afternoon. He informs us that just a few miles east of Defiance a man was run over and his body was literaly torn to pieces, so much so that no one could identify him. The engineer saw something lying on the left rail when he was quite a distance off, but supposed it was a bunch of rags or an old coat. When his train came close enough to see that it was a man lying across the rail he then could not stop his train in time to save the unfortunate man. He stopped the train soon as possible and backed up to the spot where they found more than fifty pieces of flesh. His body was scattered for roads. His entrails were torn out and his head smashed to a jelly. Most of his brains were splattered over the engine. A farmer who was close by said he saw the man walk up to a crossing and he then started down the track walking on the gravel at the side of the track. When the train whistled about a mile below he walked up between the rails and later lay down. It is thought by the farmer as well as the engineer, that the man evidently wanted to be killed and took this means of accomplishing the deed. Others thought that he might have been drunk and sat down to rest and fell asleep. Rev. Engleman says the train was delayed about one half hour.

Gravel Roads.

The subject of gravel roads is receiving a deal of attention this spring. We spoke recently of the voluntary work on roads west of town last fall, as well as those east of Auburn. To-day Wm. M. Depew of the southwest part of Jackson township was in town, and gave us a history of the work he and his neighbors expect to do. He has worked up quite a sentiment in favor of good roads, and they are making an effort to have the town line road, between Jackson on the east, and Butler and Keyser on the west, graveled from the Allen county line clear to Auburn. They are asking donations of work and of gravel. One man, Lyman Lockwood has donated gravel enough to make the road from the corner of his land, to Auburn. Many others are expected to donate more or less gravel. About 200 days' works with teams have been subscribed, and judging from the willingness of property owners and those living near the road, there will be no difficulty in getting more. The donations of work run from three to twenty days each. Now it would be in order, in our opinion, for people in town to chip in and help the good work along. And the wheelmen, who make the run to Ft. Wayne every few days, could help the good cause by donations. Let us start the gravel road boom and catch up with the procession of our sister counties.

ALL RELATING TO PEOPLE AND THINGS OF THE WORLD.

A Woman in London Whose Crimes Equal Holmes'—Attempt to Kill Non-Union Men—Six Men Killed in an Explosion at Butte, Montana.

A Woman Fiend.

London special: A Sensational arrest has been made at Reading of a woman of the name of Dyer and her son-in-law, Palmer, charged with murdering a number of infants. The bodies of six children, who had apparently been strangled to death, have been recovered from the Thames, into which they were thrown, weighted down with rocks, &c. It is added that letters were found at the woman's house showing that many of the parents with whom she and her supposed accomplice had dealings were aware of the fate intended for the infants. These letters, it appears, were from persons in all classes of society. Twenty children have disappeared.

Knocked from a Train.

John McHugh, a prominent stockman of near Carrollton, Ohio, met his death under peculiar circumstances, at Bowerstown, a Pan-handle shipping point fourteen miles south of Carrollton, Ohio, where he was shipping horses. Boarding the stock train at the yards, McHugh rode toward the station, but alighted near the bridge. In an attempt to board the moving train he was knocked off the bridge into the Connotton, a distance of twenty feet, where he was found. R. Thompson, of that place, jumped in to save McHugh, breaking his arm and narrowly escaping being drowned.

Another Explosion at Butte, Montana

An explosion of 100 pounds of giant powder by which six men were blown to pieces occurred at the 1,100 foot level of St. Lawrence mine near Butte, Mont. The names of the killed are: Con. G. Lowney, John Quinlan, Ed Shields, James Dwyer, John McVeigh, Patrick O'Rourke. The cause of the explosion is unknown as the six men killed were the only ones in the part of the mine where the disaster occurred. Owing to fall of debris in the level just after the explosion, the bodies will not be reached until late.

Hotel Dynamited.

A dynamite bomb was exploded under a hotel at Lithonia, Ga., where non union laborers were stopping. The building was badly wrecked but no one was fatally injured. The thrower of the bomb is suspected to be a union quarry workman and is the sequel of a conspiracy on the part of the union men to kill the non-union men, who made their habitation exclusively in the wrecked building.

Made Wholesale Arrests.

Grand Haven (Mich.) special: Deputy Game Warden Brewster of Grand Rapids, has begun wholesale arrests of fishermen and seizure of their nets, upon the charge that the meshes used are smaller than the lawful size. Nearly every fishing firm in Grand Haven is complained against. The men are arrested with the aid of the Sheriff as fast as they come in off the lake.

The Bar Iron Combine Abandoned.

The Merchants' Bar Iron Association of the United States is no more. After a stormy session at the Weddell house, Cleveland, Ohio, the members unanimous agreed that it would be impossible for them to ever come to an agreement and the association was formally dissolved. The death of the association was due to the fact that it could not control the output.

Hoosiers for Cuba.

Capt. Jas. Watts, a prominent citizen of Lebanon, Ind., and veteran of the late war, is organizing a company for the purpose of going to Cuba to assist the insurgents. Capt. Watts expects to have at least a hundred men in his company when he lands on Cuban soil. They will probably leave the last of this month.

April 22 and 23.—"Side Tracked."

Boys to Hang.

Duluth special: William Verill and Joseph Soular were sentenced to be hanged for the murder of Samuel DeMara, at Bewabik, on Jan. 13. Verill is 18 years of age, and Soular 17. The murder was deliberately planned. The Governor will fix the date for the hanging.

Governor Jones Dead.

San Francisco special: Gov. Jones of Nevada, died at the Palace Hotel in this city. Mr. Jones has been ill for several months, and came to this city for medical treatment.

High Treason.

Cape Town special: Gardner Williams, the American engineer who is manager of the Deebeers mines, is among the members of the reform committee who have been committed for trial at the next session of the High Court of Pretoria on the charge of high treason in participating in the uprising at Johannesburg.

Budd Doble Retires.

Budd Doble, the famous reinsman, announces that he has retired from the turf and that he has driven his last professional race. Hereafter Mr. Doble will devote his time to the development of a gold mine in California, of which he is the owner.

A Fatal Accident.

A ponderous steam excavator, pushed along by a light engine, jumped the track while crossing the Wheeling and Lake Erie Railway bridge over the Maumee River at Toledo, and, tearing through the iron work of the structure, carried the whole of an eighty foot span into the river with it. The engine remained on the track. James Marshall of Ironville, a switchman, riding on the excavator, was carried down by it and drowned. His body has not been recovered. He leaves a wife and four children. The property loss is estimated at $7,000. The bridge was erected in 1882 at a cost of $250,000. The traffic of the road will not be interfered with.

The Chicago Election.

In the election in Chicago for town officers, the Republicans carried all of the several towns by majorities ranging from one to four thousand. The campaign for Aldermen was not strictly on party lines, being more of an effort on the part of reputable citizens to oust the old gang which has controlled the Council, regardless of politics. Of the thirty-four Aldermen elected, only eight are men who were opposed by the municipal voter's league. The remaining twenty-six may be said to fairly represent the respectable element. Of the successful contestants thirteen were Democrats, eighteen Republicans and three who ran on an independent ticket.

Cuban War News.

Havana special: The insurgents have burned the cane fields and 1,700 tons of sugar at the plantation of Santa Rita De Baro, province of Matanzas. Near Jovelanos the insurgents are reported to have killed four laborers with their machettes and at Takaste they are announced to have hanged a local guerrilla. A dispatch from Trinidad says that Manuel Gonzales, the insurgent leader, has been killed and a telegram from Oliver says that four insurgents have been captured there and that in addition the authorities have made a prisoner of the mistress of the well known insurgent leader, Blas Hernandez.

Entire Family Cremated.

Wheeling special: Word has just been recived in this city from Whetstone, Marshall County, about fifteen miles from this city, that an entire family was cremated in a fire which destroyed the dwelling house of Jackson Martin. The dead are: Jackson Martin, his wife and child. Some neighbors returning from church saw the roasting bodies in the fire, but were too late to give any relief. It is supposed that Martin woke up and the smoke being so dense prevented him from finding the door and he had torn a plank off the wall, as the body was found in this opening made.

Fatal Plunge.

In anticipation of being released next day, when his term of imprisonment would expire, John Thomas sang and danced in the Allegheny County Jail Friday. He was standing on a scaffold forty feet high, and was whitewashing down a wall, when he turned suddenly to joke with other prisoners. He lost his balance and pitched headforemost to the ground, forty feet below. He alighted on his head, crushing his skull and breaking his spinal column. He died in three minutes. His home was in Youngstown, Ohio.

Fire at Chicago.

The four-story building at 278 Madison street, Chicago, was badly damaged by fire of unknown origin. A. Ellinger & Co., cloak manufacturers, occupying the three upper floors, were the heaviest losers, their stock and fixtures being damaged to the extent of $100,000; fully covered by insurance. The losses of the other occupants of the building are small, the principal damage being caused by water. The total loss is estimated at $130,000; fully covered by insurance.

Serious Casualty at Mt. Clemens.

The steel bridge spanning the Clinton river of Mt. Clemens, Mich., over which the cars of the rapid railway, an electric line, run, gave way while a motor car and three loaded gravel cars were crossing. The train was precipitated into the river. Motorman Spencer was seriously injured. Four other men who were on the gravel cars escaped by jumping.

Before His Bride's Eyes.

At Elizabeth, N. J., Frank McGinley, employed by the Singer Manufacturing Company, was killed by a Pennsylvania Railway train. McGinley had been married less than an hour before the accident which caused his death. His bride was with him when he was killed.

Good Thing for Widows.

Senator Allen has introduced a bill providing for the restoration of the names of widows of soldiers to the pension rolls after the death of the second husbands who by reason of a second marriage have been dropped from the pension rolls.

Dutch Soldiers Killed.

THURSTON'S ADVICE.

Senator Thurston of Nebraska thus, according to a McKinley organ, addressed himself to an assemblage of callow youth who call themselves "The American Republican College League:" "Political economy is no longer taught alone by our college professors, but by the bright young minds of our boys. The professor no longer has the monopoly. Young men returning from these conventions to colleges are equipped to teach their professors the real lessons of American prosperity."

To ordinarily intelligent school boys—such as these young "Republican leaguers" may in charity be presumed to be, despite their somewhat questionable procedure in gathering in "political convention" in Chicago when they might be using their own time and their parents' money to better advantage by pursuing their school studies—this must have seemed unadulterated rubbish and unutterable bosh!

From one of the boys themselves it would have been laughed at as the nonsense of the "veatiest" of loquacious simpletons. But it comes from a Senator of the United States—a great Republican statesman, heralded as "the rising hope of the stern and unbending protectionists" who are to set all things right and solve all social and economic problems which preplex the country!

Shades of Webster and Clay and Calhoun! To what has the United States Senate descended! Imagine any one of the party leaders of the past, from Thomas Jefferson to Charles Sumner, advising youth from 16 to 20 to go back to school and teach their teachers political economy or mathematics! It might as well be the one as the other. These boys are just as well qualified to set their professors right in Euclid as to instruct them in political economy.

Yet, after all, understood with its proper limitations, abominably silly as it was for this "spellbinder" from Omaha, who has been elevated by the Republican party of Nebraska to the United States Senate, to make it, there is some modicum of truth in a portion of his utterance.

Of such "political economy" as Senator Thurston and his compeers profess to hold and to teach "the college professor has no monopoly," and of it the college "Republican leaguer" is undoubtedly the better instructor. But he will have a hard time in teaching those professors that the "real lessons of American prosperity" are that scarcity makes wealth, that men grow rich by taxing themselves and that industry and commerce thrive by restrictions on trade.—Chicago Chronicle.

What Ohio Republicans Want.

At the Republican State convention of Ohio a platform was adopted which affirms the party's belief in the doctrines of extreme protection, and demands the restoration of the high tariff law repealed in 1894. This was expected from the State of Major McKinley, but it was not supposed that even in that stronghold of trade-hating doctrines the Republicans would have the hardihood to falsify the facts of history and charge the Democratic tariff with the evils which occurred under protection. Yet the Ohio platform declares that—

"We denounce the present tariff law as the sublimated product of Democratic ignorance and incompetency, bringing, as it has, to a prosperous and happy people a period of unprecedented adversity and distress, from which nothing but a return to the policy of protection can relieve it."

Either the men who wrote these words are fools, or they are knaves, who believe that the people are fools. Is there a man of voting age in the United States who believes that the people were "prosperous and happy during 1893 and the first six months of 1894." Were not those years periods of panic and bankruptcy, with trade and industry almost at a standstill? Did not the "unprecedented adversity and distress" begin and continue while the McKinley tariff was in full operation? Is it not a notorious fact that the country was doing business under the Republican policy of protection, while the poverty and suffering was at its worst? And is it not equally certain that immediately after the Wilson tariff became law industry began to revive, trade improved, wages were increased, and a period of great business activity followed?

That these plain and undisputable facts should be denied by the reckless partisans who represent the Ohio Republicans is evidence of the desperate fight which they are preparing to make to again secure power. Regardless of the truth they propose to appeal to ignorance and prejudice, and, if possible, to gain votes by cunningly devised falsehoods. But their efforts will be in vain if the Democrats will simply put before the people a statement of the real conditions which existed during the last years of McKinleyism, and of the increased prosperity which has followed the enactment of the Wilson tariff.—Exchange.

Business and Calamity Howling.

There is but one obstacle to the onward march of industrial prosperity in all departments of production in this country, and this is the incessant howling of the calamity mongers, who are again tuning up their pipes to incite fresh alarms in the coming Presidential campaign. Confidence is a plant not only of slow growth but of so great fragility that it is liable to be destroyed by a very slight blast. Businesss men, therefore, owe it to themselves as well as to the public to frown down every attempt of the calamity howlers to make party capital by studied misrepresentations of the industrial and commercial condition of the country. Croakers of evil have existed in the most prosperous epochs, and will never cease to exist. But there is no question at all that the industrial reaction of 1894 following the financial crisis of 1893 was greatly aggravated by malicious partisan howlings. The distrust thus engendered communicated itself from industry to industry until the depression became almost universal. Undue hopefulness of the industrial future is not commendable, but it is a patriotic virtue in comparison with the malignant spirit that seeks to prevent all current facts of trade merely to promote party ends.—Philadelphia Record.

The Proofs of Prosperity.

The little sheet issued by the Bureau of Statistics on exports and imports for February and for the eight months ending in February, 1895 and 1896, reflects the condition of our foreign trade most encouragingly.

In February, 1895, we sent abroad only $55,982,734 worth of merchandise. In February, this year, our exports of goods amounted to $77,710,938, a gain of more than $21,000,000, or over 38 per cent.

For the eight months ending with February, 1895, our exports of merchandise amounted to $557,885,668. For the corresponding eight months of this year they were swelled to $602,614,981.

Our imports for February, 1895, were $58,315,981. For February, 1896, they were $62,587,298. For the eight months in 1895 they were $466,233,616, while for the eight months of this fiscal year they were $541,212,774, a gain of nearly $75,000,000.

These figures mean that the people of this country have been busier this year than last; that they have had a larger trade both in exports and imports; that they have sold more goods and are able to buy more; that more men and women have been employed, more wages paid and a greater prosperity secured. It is a good showing and an encouraging one.

For a full return to abounding prosperity we need only one thing—peace on the tariff question. The politicians are not inclined to give us either. Perhaps the common sense of the people may find a way to control the politicians.—New York World.

Income Tax in France.

The French Chamber of Deputies has accepted the principle of a tax on incomes as part of the national revenue system, and the details of the law under which the tax will be levied are now being considered by the Budget Committee. As soon as a bill is reported the question will again come before the chamber, and will doubtless be decided in the same way as on the preliminary vote.

As any tax on revenues is better than taxes on the food and clothing of the people, this action of the French Government is a long step in the right direction. French trade and industry will flourish in proportion as they are freed from the oppressive taxes now levied on them and the forty millions of France will become more prosperous. An income tax may not be the best of all possible taxes, but it is far better than customs duties or taxes on industry.

The Tariff "Flood" Myth.

The plain people are going to reckon with the men who have prevented repairing the protective levee this year, exactly as they will reckon with the men who broke it through and let in the flood of foreign competition in 1894.—New York Tribune.

Our high-tariff neighbor, although quite familiar with the government reports, professes to believe that a great "flood" of imports followed the enactment of the tariff law now in force. The Tribune has spoken of it daily for the last year and a half. But has the incoming of this "flood" been revealed by the official reports? Let us see.

The following table shows the imports of free and dutiable goods during the four fiscal years of the McKinley tariff, the annual average for those years, and the imports for the fiscal year 1895, which was the first fiscal year of the present tariff, the new law having been in force during ten months of it:

	Free of Duty.	Dutiable.
1891.....	$388,064,404	$466,455,173
1892.....	458,074,604	355,526,741
1893.....	444,172,064	400,282,519
1894.....	378,968,717	257,645,703
Four years.	$1,669,279,789	$1,479,910,136
Annual aver.	$417,319,947	$369,977,534
1895.....	$376,890,100	$354,271,990

Where are the signs of that "flood?" The imports, either free or dutiable, during the first fiscal year of the present law, were less than the annual average for the four years of the McKinley tariff. The dutiable imports of 1893 were exceeded by those of every year of the McKinley act except the panic year of 1894, and the free imports of 1895 were less than those of any McKinley year.

We commend these figures to the attention of our neighbor and to the thoughtful consideration of all the high tariff organizations and newspapers, which have been striving for more than a year past to mislead the public about a "flood" that has not yet been sighted.—New York Times.

American Boots and Shoes in England.

According to the London Boot and Shoe Trades Journal, the English manufacturers of footwear have nothing to fear from French, Austrian, or German competition, as in spite of their cheaper labor the imports from those countries is steadily declining. Not so with the importations from America, which are rapidly increasing. The reason, says the Journal, is not because of cheap raw material or the low wages of American shoemakers, but the low cost of production, the result of improved machinery and highly skilled labor.

The successful competition by American industry with the long-established boot and shoe manufacturers of England is a fact which contradicts the protectionist theory that we need a tariff against European cheap labor. England, where wages are far higher than in protection Austria, France and Germany, can undersell those countries. If our boots and shoes can in turn undersell the English products, why do we need a tariff "to protect" our home market?

Running Too Fast at the Start.

There is significance in the suggestion of Dr. Depew that "there is such a thing as a man running so fast as to be out of breath when the time comes to jump." He was referring to the force with which the McKinley wave is sweeping over the country, according to the estimate of the McKinley organs, and made a figure that was as keen as it was expressive. Blaine ran too fast in 1876 and fell down at the hurdle. Grant galloped off with the speed of the wind in 1880, but failed when the leap was due, and McKinley has been making a great race thus far.—Kansas City Star.

Protection from What.

The announcement is made in London that a leading iron firm in England has made extensive purchases of Alabama pig iron; and the London Iron and Coal Trade Review, commenting on this fact, declares that "England is threatened with an invasion of American pig iron." And still our iron masters must have protection!—Philadelphia Record.

Warning to the Missionaries.

McKinley's missionaries have invaded Kentucky despite the repeated assurance that she has a favorite son of her own. If these political drummers "get too gay" it would not surprise the country beyond recovery should the Governor again call out the troops.—Detroit Free Press

ANOTHER SPRING BLIZZARD.

—Chicago Chronicle.

FULL TICKET NAMED.

THE ILLINOIS PROHIBITIONISTS CHOOSE CANDIDATES.

Hale Johnson the Nominee for Governor—Second Place Goes to Windle—Alonzo E. Wilson, of Chicago, Secretary of State; A. J. Barrett, Auditor Declare for Free Silver.

The Prohibitionists of Illinois in State convention assembled at Springfield adopted a platform declaring for the prohibition of the liquor traffic; giving the right to vote to women and men; extension of the civil service system to all grades of public service; free schools to children; observance of Sunday; a tariff commission representing all political parties; election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people and free coinage of silver.

A lively fight was precipitated on the adoption of the financial plank of the platform. The majority report was in favor of "issuing gold, silver and paper by the Government only in sufficient quantity to meet the demands of business and give full opportunity for the employment of labor and to be full legal tender for all debts, public and private." The minority report added the words: "That the Government should not discriminate in favor of gold as against silver, and that its mints should be open upon equal terms to both at the ratio now established by law."

After a heated discussion, in which about 100 delegates participated, the minority report was finally adopted by a vote of 212 to 169. Dr. Evans, of Hedding College, was selected to take charge of the campaign fund, and $2,000 was subscribed by the delegates present as a starter.

After the adoption of the platform the convention adjourned until the following morning, when a full State ticket was nominated as follows:

Governor.....Hale Johnson
Lieutenant Governor.....C. A. Windle
Secretary of State.....Alonzo E. Wilson
Auditor.....A. J. Bassett
Treasurer.....E. K. Hays
Attorney General.....Robert H. Patton
University Trustees—Miss Lucy P. Gaston, Mrs. Carrie L. Grout, Mrs. Ella M. Orr.
United States Senator....Dan R. Sheen

A resolution was adopted requesting Congress to pass a law to prohibit the manufacture, sale or importation of liquor into the District of Columbia, the Territories and military reservations of the United States and to repeal all tax and license laws.

THE SAILORS' FRIEND.

Samuel Plimsoll, Who Has Spent His Life for Seafaring Men.

Samuel Plimsoll, who is now seriously ill in London, has spent most of his life in trying to help the seafaring man. For many years he has been called the sailors' friend. He is the fourth son of Thomas and Priscilla Plimsoll, and was born at Bristol in 1824. When he was but a small child he removed with his parents to Penrith, and it was here he was given his early education by the curate of the parish. He was later sent to Sheffield to attend a private school at that place. He started out in life as a clerk in a solicitor's office, then tried clerking in a brewery and was promoted to the position of manager. In that capacity he remained until 1853, when he went to London and opened a business for himself. He successfully contested Derby in the liberal interest in 1868 and sat for that town in 1880, when he gave up his seat to Sir William Vernon Harcourt. This was an act of great unselfishness on the part of the man. He had gone into Parliament for the express purpose of helping the sailors and gave up his seat from the same motive. He was convinced that a cabinet minister would be able to render better service to the cause of the sailors than a private member, and hence made way for Harcourt. His career in Parliament was useful, and he was instrumental in passing acts for the amendment of the shipping laws in 1871, 1873, 1875 and 1876. In 1877 Mr. Plimsoll published "Our Seamen," and since then wrote and published a sequel to it. In 1890 he published a work on "Cattle Ships." When the National Amalgamated Sailors' and Firemen's Union of Great Britain and Ireland was organized in 1890 Mr. Plimsoll accepted the presidency of the union, but afterward retired.

RECORD OF THE WEEK

INDIANA INCIDENTS TERSELY TOLD.

Kokomo Has a Tremendous Gas Explosion—Widespread Ruin the Result—Joseph Mix Rapidly Sinking Because of Son's Alleged Disgrace

Terrible Explosion of Gas.

The most destructive natural gas explosion that ever occurred in the Indiana gas belt took place in Kokomo at noon Friday, the station of the Kokomo Natural Gas and Oil Company, consisting of four iron and brick buildings, located in the central part of the city, being demolished and many houses in the immediate neighborhood being shattered and almost wrecked. Fire burst forth from the ruins just after the explosion and the plant and machinery were entirely consumed. So violent was the shock of the explosion that windows three squares away were broken to flinders and men and horses going along the street were knocked down and seriously injured. Joseph Lindley, superintendent of the plant, was in the office when the explosion occurred and was hurled through one of the windows and fell forty feet away. Two horses in the works were raised high in the air and were crushed to death in the fall and their bodies burned. No lives were lost, though several employes were slightly hurt. The company furnished fuel gas for domestic consumption, and hundreds of families were thus cut off without fuel supply. Among the buildings that suffered most from the shock of the explosion were the jail and the court house, both of which had the windows torn out and bricks and stones displaced.

Noted Seer of White River Dying.

Joseph Mix, of Anderson, the old seer of White River, known as such all over Ohio and Indiana, is reported dying. He was declared of unsound mind some time ago and his money, or rather that part which could be found, was put into the hands of a guardian. He is 70 years of age and has gained his title from the fact that he had a strange insight into the future. He could, it is said, locate missing, stolen or lost articles, could tell who the thieves were and do many equally strange things. He practiced his art in Indiana for forty years and during his last years people came from the Eastern and Western States to have him locate lost children. In this manner he amassed a fortune and it is thought that he buried most of it. When his estate was turned over to the guardians but $4,000 could be found. It is thought that he is worth many times this amount. His aberration was due to a peculiar circumstance. His son Joe married and later sold his wife and threw in her bed clothing to Joe Badgley, a neighbor, for $25 on easy payments. The bed clothes were thrown in to fill out the bargain and the money was paid and he delivered the wife. The sale would probably have held good but for the State stepping in and taking a hand. The news was sent out through a press association and the similarity in names caused many to think that it was him. It turned his mind and he has been failing ever since.

All Over the State.

Frank Brown, a prominent Terre Haute citizen, and treasurer for the local lodges of Red Men, has been missing for several days. His accounts are said to be correct, and it is feared that he has been driven to suicide by continued ill health.

At Portland, Ida Tullis brought suit against Valentine Flanding, Jr., for $5,000 damages, alleging breach of promise. She asserts that on two occasions they had arranged to be married, but that both times Valentine failed to appear.

T. L. Coons, a druggist of Edinburg, committed suicide by swallowing prussic acid. After swallowing the poison he claimed that it was taken by mistake. The deceased was married five years ago, and leaves a wife and child. Quite recently he dissipated to excess.

Dr. A. C. Jones, commander of Williams Post, G. A. R., of Muncie, has decided to be a candidate for department commander at the coming State encampment at South Bend. Dr. Jones entered the war as drummer boy in Colorado at the age of 12 years.

William Smelz, a farmer, residing north of Mishawaka, was hitching up a team, when a calf ran out of the barn and kicked him in the face, severely injuring him. At the same time one of the horses kicked him in the side near the lower ribs. He is in a precarious condition.

At Elkhart, fire completely destroyed the residence and contents belonging to Jacob Geiser. Loss, $2,500; insured in the Concordia, of New York, for $1,000. Geiser had $3,000 in gold and $1,000 in greenbacks hidden away in the cellar, which was found safe in the debris.

William Kemper and John Lipkie, of Otis, engaged in a friendly contest for boxing supremacy in a saloon. A ring was formed by bystanders and the men, stripped to the waist, sailed into each other. After a few passes Kemper struck Lipkie in the abdomen. The injured man fell unconscious and remained so until Thursday, when he expired. The coroner has not rendered his verdict, but it is believed the affray will require grand jury investigation. Kemper was a passenger conductor on the Monon for a number of years, and was also a former township official.

The village of Bristol, in the upper edge of Elkhart County, is excited over the developments following the finding of a counterfeiters' plant in subterranean apartments on an island in the St. Joe river. The outfit included tools, molds, dies, milling machines, etc., besides a pile of bogus gold and silver coin in all stages of development. Among the spoils was an old pocketbook, identified as belonging to Jonathan Crumpacker, who was assassinated near Bristol a year ago, as well as papers and other documents taken at the time of the robbery of the Bristol postoffice nearly two years ago.

Three farmers met a tramp in the road near Columbus and demanded that he dance for them, at the same time touching him up with their blacksnake whips. The tramp said he had a harp and if one of them would play he would dance. He handed the harp to one man, at the same time pulling a revolver, and turned the tables on them by compelling one of them to play and the others to dance till they almost fell from exhaustion.

CHAPTER V.

After the departure of her old school fellow for the continent Constance was not left long alone. She was provided with another companion in the shape of the Countess of Seafield, who looked twenty-five, though she had been a wife for fifteen years, and had contrived to break several hearts before she had consented to make one man happy. She was par excellence a woman of the world, and for that very reason she had been chosen by Mrs. Meason for Lady Constance's chaperon, and under the countess' protecting wing Lady Constance had made her first entrance into London society.

She was sitting in Lady Constance's boudoir, sipping tea out of egg-shell china, one afternoon. She was dressed in a loose robe of white cashmere, which became her wonderfully, and her golden hair fell in heavy masses to her waist; her pale blue eyes were dreamily regarding Lady Constance.

"By the way," she was saying, "what has become of that handsome cousin of yours? Do you know I was quite afraid you were going to fall in love with him?"

"Were you?" said Constance with a smile.

"Indeed, I was. Do you remember the night of Lady Codrington's ball? I feigned a headache in order to get you away. Poor fellow!"

"Why poor fellow?" said Constance.

"Because he is a soldier," replied the countess sentimentally, "and will be sure to get his throat cut one of these days. That reminds me. Our troops are going out to fight the Zulus. Good gracious, Constance, what is the matter?"

The girl's cheeks grew deathly pale, and her hands trembled violently. She fixed her dark eyes anxiously upon her companion's face, and said in an eager, tremulous voice:

"Did you say, Lady Seafield, that war is declared, and that our troops have been ordered out to fight?"

"Assuredly, my dear, but that need not send you into hysterics."

"Then Frank is going," continued Constance. "I am sure of it, though he has not said so. He was to have paid me a visit—we expected him to-day by the train which brought you. Instead of coming he sent a letter by the guard of the train, saying that important business would detain him in town for two days longer; at the end of that time he hoped to join us in Avondale."

As soon as Constance found herself alone she took out the letter which she had received from Frank that day, and read it again. Was it possible, she asked herself, that Lady Seafield was right? Could it be that Frank, her lover, was to be called out to fight, to be wounded, and perhaps left to meet a terrible death among the dead on the field of battle?

Two anxious days passed, and the morning of Frank's expected arrival found her at the station an hour ahead of the train. She was fluttering with delight as her lover stepped on the platform and led her out of the station to the carriage which was to take them up to the Castle. The moment he found himself in the brougham Frank took her in his arms and kissed her tenderly.

"Well, Connie," said he, "it is settled, my darling. I am to go away! I have got one day to spend with you; to-night I return to town again, and in a week we start!"

"You are going to Zululand?" said Constance, fixing her eyes earnestly upon him. "You are going into action, Frank?"

"Yes, my darling," returned the young fellow in as light a tone as he could assume; "but that need not alarm you, Constance. Only one thing distresses me."

"What is that, Frank?"

"The thought of leaving you! At the best, it is hard enough to part from those we love; but for me it is terrible. Constance, I have thought of a plan, and I mean to propose it to you. Before I go I want you to become my wife!"

"Frank, do you wish me to marry you in secret, and let no one know but you and I?"

"No, Constance, I do not wish that. Hitherto we have been fair and open; let us remain so. Mrs. Meason consented to our engagement, she will consent to our marriage. I don't want to take you from her; I only wish to feel that no one on earth can take my darling from me."

When the critical moment came Constance trembled and grew faint-hearted, but Frank was full of confidence, and with the light of hope and love in his eyes he looked superbly handsome. Mrs. Meason thought this when he appeared in her boudoir; but as she looked at him her face grew cold and hard. He told her of his sudden call to duty, and she expressed a hope that he would earn distinction.

"I wish to make Constance my wife before I go to the war," said he.

For a moment she was silent. What she thought no one could tell; her face was like a marble mask. Frank looked at her inquiringly, and she said:

"What you ask is impossible, quite impossible!"

"Perhaps you misunderstood me," said Frank. "I do not wish to take Constance from you, and I am sure she loves you too well to wish to go. All I wish is to feel that I have a wife to strive for, and to return to when my work is done!"

"I understand perfectly," she said. "You wish to bind Constance, while you yourself will remain free. Well, it cannot be. In consenting to your engagement I have already conceded much. You must remember the marriage is not at all a suitable one for my grandchild. Of course, it is natural that your family should wish it to come about. Young ladies of good family with many thousands of pounds are not to be met with every day; and they do not usually bestow themselves upon penniless younger sons, who come of no better family than themselves."

She paused, and Frank said nothing; but the hot blood suffused his face, and he was angrily biting his lip. He could not trust himself to speak. A few hours later, however, when his anger and indignation had in a measure passed away, he returned to Mrs. Meason and pleaded his cause eloquently. But neither his pleading nor Constance's tears had the least effect in altering a decision which was intended to be final.

When the hour of parting came the lovers went out to take a last kiss and whisper a last adieu; they stood together on the borders of Avondale Park, with the smoothly kept lawns all around them and the silent sky above.

"Constance," said Frank, "now I see what you suffer, I almost curse the day that I ever crossed your path."

"Don't say that, Frank!" returned the girl. "You brought me the one great joy of my life."

"And the greatest sorrow!"

The girl sighed wearily.

"When I was a child, my grandmother said to me one day, 'Always remember, Constance, that a great love means a great sorrow.' At the time I did not understand what she meant. I do not understand it now. Tell me, Frank, why should it be? Why should we be tortured so cruelly? In this world it takes so little to make one happy, yet there are always lips that say 'that little shall not be yours!' It is a cruel world, and yet all might be so different."

"All will be different, my Constance, when I come back."

"When you come back!" she repeated dreamily. "Oh, Frank, suppose you never come back to me, suppose we never meet again!"

Suddenly their interview was brought to an end; the sound of wheels reached them, and Frank knew that the carriage was waiting to take him away.

"Constance," he said softly, "good-by!" But the girl clung wildly to him.

"You cannot go, Frank, you must not go; I tell you it will kill me!"

"Constance, try to be brave, it is only for a little while, and then we shall be man and wife."

He stooped to kiss her; with a cry she threw her arms about him and fell fainting upon his shoulder.

CHAPTER VI.

Several months had elapsed since Frank had departed for the seat of war, and Constance was still at Avondale Castle. On this day she had gone out sailing with the duke.

The second dinner bell had sounded, and most of Mrs. Meason's guests were assembled in the drawing room before Constance returned from her expedition on the sea. Mrs. Meason, after one look at the girl's face, clearly divined it was no ordinary circumstance which had kept her absent so long.

"Constance," she said when they were all seated at table, "where is the duke?"

In a moment the girl felt that all eyes were upon her. She looked up, flushing slightly, and replied as lightly as possible:

"I suppose by this time he is at home, grandma. When he said he would dine here he had not anticipated that in order to keep his word he would be compelled to eat his dinner in clothes which were saturated with salt water."

After dinner Constance pleaded headache, and at once sought her room. There she remained until she believed that every soul in the house had retired to rest; then she came forth, looking very pale and agitated, and hurriedly passed on to her grandmother's room.

"Are you not in bed, my child!" she said, as the girl came hurriedly toward her and knelt trembling at her feet.

"No, grandma," returned the girl, earnestly. "I could not sleep until I had spoken with you alone."

"You have something important to say, Constance?"

"Yes, something very important, grandma. Do you remember the scene which took place between us a few months ago? You asked me to swear that I would never speak to any one of my engagement to Frank without your express permission. I did as you wished, and I have never broken my oath. To-day I was sorely tempted to break it; therefore I want you to release me from it—will you?"

"No; I cannot release you. There is no reason why you should speak; there is every reason why you should remain silent."

"I tell you, grandma, there are urgent reasons why I should speak. This secrecy placed me and others in a false position; they think I am free, whereas I am as much bound as if I were already a married woman."

The old lady looked at her steadily, and asked:

"Why do you wish to divulge this secret? Whom do you wish to tell?"

"I wish to tell the Duke d'Azzeglio, because——"

"Yes, because?"

"He has asked me to become his wife."

"The Duke d'Azzeglio has asked you to marry him?" said Mrs. Meason.

"Yes, grandma. For some time I have feared he would do so, and I have tried every means in my power to prevent it; but this evening he did me the honor to offer me his hand."

"You say well, child," returned the old lady, whose pale cheek had flushed with excitement; "it was an honor which has been coveted by many great ladies. Well, Constance, what did you say?"

"What did I say? Dear grandma, what could I say? I told him I could never respond to his wishes."

"And he accepted his dismissal?"

"Far from it. My refusal made him urge his suit the more. And now you will allow me to tell the duke that I am engaged to Frank, and then he will cease to pursue me."

She paused; but no answer came. The old lady's face was as white as that of a corpse—her hands opened and shut convulsively, her breath came in short, quick pants.

"Grandma," cried the girl, "what is the matter? Is there more trouble—more misery?"

"Trouble? yes, if you make it; misery? if you will. Constance, you must marry the Duke d'Azzeglio."

"Marry the duke? Am I not bound to Frank?"

"No. On the very day he left I told him I would not have you bound. I told him his proposition was a cowardly one, worthy only of his father's son."

"His father's son! Do you hate Frank because he bears his father's name?"

For a moment the old lady hesitated; her pale cheek flushed; her features were strangely contracted; with an effort she controlled herself, and quietly took the girl's hand.

"Constance, my child," she said, "you have often asked me to show you the room where your poor mother died. I will show it you to-night."

She took up a small oil lamp and walked from room to room, followed by Constance. They passed along the corridors, pausing at length before a door which had not been opened for years. Mrs. Meason unlocked the door and stood in the middle of the floor, looking wearily about her.

"Come in," she said; "come in, my child, and look at the room. Constance, look at that bed; for weeks and weeks your mother lay there, neglected and alone, dying of a broken heart. When she was dead I took you in my arms, and, kneeling beside that bed and looking into her sweet face, all white and cold, I swore that you should avenge her."

"Avenge her! How could I do that? You say my poor mother died of a broken heart? I know it; Frank has told me; it was my father who killed her."

"Your father? He told you that? Then I spoke wisely when I said he was his father's son. As your mother was deceived, he would deceive you. Your mother, as he said, was cruelly murdered, but it was not your father who killed her!"

"Not my father?"

"Your father had a brother who hated him because he was the elder son, and inherited the title which would otherwise have descended to himself and his heirs. Your father married, and from that moment the family, headed by this man, determined to hunt your mother down."

"Oh! this is terrible."

"I hated them all, but most of all the hated one man, he who had persecuted my child through life, and drove her to her grave. That man, Constance, now bears your father's title—he is the Earl of Harrington—Frank Howarth's father!"

"Frank's father! he killed my mother!"

"He broke your mother's heart."

"Oh, grandma, it can't be true; there must be some fatal misconception!"

"There is no mistake. His father hunted your mother into her grave. With her dying lips she, the gentlest creature on earth, cursed his very name."

"But where was my father that he suffered this?"

"Your father, Constance, was an old man, an invalid, entirely under the influence of his brother, who is now a miserable man with a barren coronet, which is stained with your mother's blood."

"I cannot believe it. Frank knows nothing of this, and his father, who, you say, behaved so infamously, is quite willing that I should become Frank's wife."

"Shall I tell you why? It is because he knows Frank is penniless, and that you will inherit my wealth. The man who killed the mother now pursues the daughter; but while I have strength to prevent it, my money shall not go to enrich the son of a man who killed my beloved child!"

Half an hour later Mrs. Meason went in search of Lady Constance's maid. Having roused her, she led her to the deserted room in the west wing, where they found Constance lying in a fainting fit upon the floor.

(To be continued.)

SALISBURY'S JINGOISM.

It Is of the Same Stripe as That of Lord Palmerston.

It is doubtful if any considerable body of men exist who have a sincerer love of fair play, a more honest desire to see impartial justice done, or a truer respect for self-restrained and unselfish action, than the mass of American and British citizens, when they lay aside personal prejudice and calmly consider the right and wrong of a course of public or private policy; but it is not at all doubtful that to induce them to do this would be regarded as bad politics and worse journalism by the great authorities in the political and journalistic world.

One of the commonplaces of their economy, indeed, is that power consists, not so much in the clear vision and firm grasp of truth, nor in a plain and unadorned appeal to the best judgment of their fellow-citizens, as in a "pull" upon their prejudice, and in an ability to arouse them to blind and unquestioning "enthusiasm." Hence the free coinage of watchwords in every campaign, which, as a New England clergyman once suggested to the writer, is likely to prove dangerous to the commonweal. Doubtless it has been so since politics began. The demagogue and the poor are ever with us. I have cited the case of Lord Palmerston, however, because it is so marked, and because its influence has proved so lasting. The Jingoism of the Marquis of Salisbury, for instance, is undoubtedly a culture from the original Palmerston microbe, although the virus may have become somewhat attenuated in the process.—Century.

Practical Joking.

W. Beatty Kingston, in "Men, Cities and Events," tells a story illustrating the good humor of the second German Emperor.

When he was crown prince he was addicted to good-natured, practical joking, which now and then resulted in complications requiring him to prove that he could take as well as give a jest.

As he was one of the strongest and best swimmers in the German army, he was in the habit during the summer of taking a plunge before breakfast every morning in the large swimming bath used by the Potsdam garrison.

Now and then, when the "school" was full of huge guardsmen taking their swimming drill, he would amuse himself by swimming up to some clumsy giant, seizing him by the back of the neck, and ducking his head under water until he gasped.

Having diverted himself in this way on one ocasion, he called out, "Now, men, you may try it on me." Almost before the words were out of his mouth he was seized from behind, and obliged to execute several involuntary dives. He had been so quickly taken at his word that he swallowed a quantity of water, and hardly had sufficient breath to cry, "Enough!"

When he had recovered he turned to the man and asked his name.

"Schott, of Nimmersatt"—a village on the frontier of East Prussia.

"How long have you served?"

"Two years, your Imperial Highness."

"Have you had a furlough yet?"

"No, Imperial Highness, my home is too far off, and the journey too expensive."

Two days later, says Mr. Kingston, Grenadier Schott was summoned to the office of his regimental adjutant, and there informed that a furlough of a fortnight was granted him to visit his family, and he was ordered to apply for traveling and diet expenses to the court marshal of his Imperial Highness, the crown prince.

A diamond of exceptional beauty and of the unusual size of 655 karats was found a fortnight ago in the Jagersfontein mine, in the Orange Free State.

TO BE WORN BUT ONCE.

The Empress of Russia's $200,000 Coronation Robe.

A fifth of a million of dollars for a dress to be worn only once. Just think of it! That amount of money invested at 6 per cent. would bring in a tidy little income of $12,000 a year of $1,000 a month. Most women would be willing to accept the responsibility of worrying along on $12,000 a year, and run the risk of affording one or two becoming gowns in the bargain. The lump sum of $200,000, which this rate of interest represents, has already been invested in a coronation robe for Alexandra Feodorovna, Empress of Russia.

For a few hours on the 24th of May she will wear this gown which has taken six months to complete. It then becomes practically state property, and will spend the remainder of its existence in a glass case labeled, "Coronation Robe of Her Imperial Majesty Alexandra Feodorovna, Empress-Consort of Russia."

A $200,000 costume lying useless in a glass case, after a few hours' wear, will make a nice target for the eloquence of anarchists, nihilists, socialists and all the other "ists" in which Russia abounds. It may be imagined that they will do full justice to its every pearl and diamond, its fretwork of golden threads and the six months of patient toil that it took to complete it.

Two hundred thousand dollars will by no means complete the cost of the Empress' coronation costume. There is also the ermine-line mantle of burnished silver brocade. And the state jewels, the coronet of which is estimated to have cost $1,000,000.

The necklet contains some of the finest crown jewels in Europe, and in addition to these state gems she will wear all the gifts of jewelry which her husband has given to her since their marriage. Surely Solomon, even in his palmiest days, could not go the Empress one better.

THE RUSSIAN EMPRESS' $200,000 CORONATION ROBE.

If any occasion could justify the resurrection of that once popular stand-by "baffles description," it would be an attempt to give an adequate idea of this wonderful gown, which represents the work of so many skillful hands. A world-famed artist designed it, a world-famed milliner constructed it, and a world-famed jeweler directed its adornment.

SERVED FORTY YEARS.

Miss Stone Has Been Postmistress that Length of Time.

Miss Martha Elvira Stone has been postmistress at North Oxford, Mass., for forty years. Franklin Pierce was the President who appointed her. A queer old daguerreotype of Miss Stone was exhibited at the World's Fair as the oldest United States postmistress, but this is a new picture of her, taken only a few weeks ago.

Miss Stone is 79 years old and a cousin of Clara Barton, the great army nurse.

A Famous Book.

Concerning the making of that most popular of all child's books, "Shock-Headed Peter," its author, Dr. Hoffmann, of Frankfort, Germany, tells this story: He had been searching high and low for a suitable picture-book for his two-year-old boy, but in vain. At last he purchased a blank copy-book and told his wife he was going to make a picture-book for the boy—"one he can understand, and in which the tedious morals 'be obedient,' 'be calm,' 'be industrious,' are brought home in a manner which impresses the young child." He knew nothing of drawing, but he set to work and produced the gruesome picture of all the naughty boys and girls which everybody knows. His child was delighted, and when some of his circle of literary friends saw it they urged him to have it published before the boy spoiled it, and a publisher said he would bring it out. "Well," said Dr. Hoffmann, "give me eighty gulden" (about $25), "and try your fortune. Don't make it expensive, and don't make it too strong. Children like to tear books as well as to read them, and nursery-books ought not to be heirlooms. They ought to last only a time." An edition of fifteen hundred was quickly sold, and now one hundred and seventy-five editions have appeared in Germany and forty in England, and it has been translated into Russian, Swedish, Danish, Dutch, French, Italian and Portuguese, and it has penetrated India, Africa and Australia.

WHIPPED AT LAST.

How the Bully of a Michigan Logging Camp Met Defeat.

In the logging camps of Michigan might makes right, and the man who has whipped all comers in fair fights is king of his camp.

One of these, said a logger to a Washington Star reporter, was very boastful of his exploits. He had been the victor in a dozen fights, and no one cared to enter the lists with him, but every man in the camp hated the champion. Going into a saloon one day he announced:

"I'm tired of these babies in the camp. I ain't had a good fight in Michigan. I can whip my weight in dogs, wildcats or anything that breathes for $100."

A meek-looking man took the bet and arrangements for the fight were made. It was to take place in a closed room, one week from the time the bet was made.

TOO MUCH FOR THE BULLY.

The day came, and the champion called, "Bring on your animile." The man who had bet against the king of the camb brought his antagonist in a large sack, which had been deposited behind the stove in the saloon where the match had been entered into, the weather just beginning to get cold. The gladiator entered the room, the sack was emptied and the people crowded at the window to see the contest. Out of the sack came three large hornet nests, the occupants of which had been revived by the heat.

They issued from the nests in swarms and lit all over the man. He fought them for a minute or two, then, with a yell, jumped through the window, carrying sash and glass with him, never stopping until he reached the river, into which he jumped.

"Said he could whip his weight in anything that breathed," remarked the meek little man, as he pocketed the stakes, "but about five pounds of hornets knocked him out in the first round."

Deaths from Chloroform.

It is stated that fifty-two deaths occurred within the past year in the United Kingdom from the administration of chloroform. This would be a fearful indictment against the use of that anaesthetic if we only knew what was the relative proportion of patients submitted to its influence and to the influence of other anaesthetics. In other words, if the number of chloroform cases were fifty-two times the number of nitrous oxide cases, chloroform would be no more dangerous, although it might have caused fifty-two deaths for one death caused by the latter anaesthetic.

OYSTER AS A MOTHER.

WHY SHE LOSES MILLIONS OF HER CHILDREN ANNUALLY.

She Is Lazy and Very Negligent—If She Were Careful Oysters Would Cover the Earth.

Submarine circles are scandalized, according to a very learned man, Prof. Herdman, who has been lecturing before a very learned audience, the Malacological Society of London, on "The Culture of the Edible Oyster." He discloses a state of things which amounts to little less than a crying scandal in submarine circles—a scandal compared with which the Massacre of the Innocents is a dewdrop to the Pacific Ocean. The ordinary man knows but little of the life of the oyster until it appears, inviting deglutition, upon its half-shell at table. He regards family life as sacred, and judges the oyster solely on its public form. To him the oyster's past is nothing; he is only concerned with its immediate future.

The learned lecturer, however, had no such scruples, and, after the manner of "scientists," turned the daylight of the magic-lantern upon the oyster's tenderest and most intimate family relations. The result, as we have hinted, was a revelation of an astonishing state of things.

At the first glance it would appear from Prof. Herdman's researches that the oyster is doing its very best to lower its own price; and to that extent we may commend it, and even encourage it to further efforts. If you buy a single oyster, and instead of eating it forthwith, put it in a nice, comfortable place, where it will be free from worry, and leave it there for a season you will find that under favorable conditions that oyster has started a family of sixteen millions, which will not only afford you an ample meal for yourself, but leave enough over to send around to your more intimate acquaintances.

If, however, you still postpone your enjoyment, and leave your oysters to live their own lives in comfort, you will find that at the end of the next season that you have between two or three millions of billions of oysters, which you may easily ascertain to be sufficient for all people that on earth do dwell, if everybody in the world had an oyster supper every night for a year.

If this sort of thing went on for a few years more, there would be room in the world for nothing but oysters. Oysters would have to sup on us, instead of furnishing forth our suppers, and the shells would lie twenty deep all over the earth.

Now, all this is not in the least fanciful; it is simple arithmetic. Why are they not a penny a billion, as they should be? Prof. Herdman knows why, and he told the Malacological Society.

It is no good mincing matters. Much as we may admire the oyster, we cannot blind ourselves to its faults, nor refrain from pointing them out to an interested public. The oyster, though so excellent a companion at lunch or at dinner, or at supper, is grossly incompetent as a wife and a mother. Her family is large; but she takes no pains to keep it out of mischief. She is—we must speak plainly—lazy.

She does not keep her children, which she calls "spat" at home, and bring them up carefully; she lets them run about all over the place, and tumble into the first herring that comes along. She is quite negligent. This is the more reprehensible since the dangers that surround the infant oyster are almost innumerable. The taste for oysters is by no means confined to the human race. There is scarcely a thing that swims which is not on the lookout for them, and the oyster is quite as much sought after in the sea as in the city.

But little imagination is required to picture the result of this shocking negligence on the part of the maternal oyster. Out of a family which with due care would number sixteen million, she seldom rears more than a dozen. Thus we are face to face with a problem. We have to grapple with the fact that year by year hundreds of billions of fresh young lives are cut off before they have well realized what it is to live. To them the world opens but to close again in darkness and the tomb; it is but one step from the cradle to the grave.

Something surely can be done to stem the terrible tide of destruction which overwhelms so many of these innocent creatures. We cannot even be sure that it is the most succulent that survive.

Money and the Germs of Disease.

The bacteriologist has declared that the surfaces of coins of all metals and denominations and bank notes of every description are simply swarming with germs of various degrees of virulence. Cultures have shown the presence of from 450 to 3500 germs upon a single coin, ranging from the streptococcus and staphylococcus pyogenes to tubercle bacilli and typhoid bacilli. These have been deposited, of course, from contact with saliva, pus, discharges, soiled fingers and dirty pockets. That these germs are virulent has recently been shown by inoculating rabbits with their cultures and obtaining characteristic reactions.

But it was soon noticed that the proportion of the fatal results from these inoculations was extremely small, considering the nature of the germs present, and a series of recent experiments at an Algerian military hospital has developed the surprising fact that coins possess actual bactericidal properties and rapidly destroy or weaken any germs lodged upon their surfaces. In a cold chamber the germs of typhoid and the Friedlander bacillus were destroyed upon sterling silver or copper coins in 18 hours; at a temperature of 37 degrees C, about that of the pocket, the bacilli of typhoid, of diphtheria, of blue pus, and the streptococcus are destroyed in six hourrs. The Loffler bacillus is the most resistant, and upon cold silver or copper coins will live for from three to six days. Moisture and warmth greatly hasten the process, which is probably due to the formation of poisonous oxides and other salts of the metals.

Mrs. Weatherwax—I don't see where all the money comes from for these wars they are carrying on all over the earth.

Mr. Weatherwax—I don't know myself, but seems to me that the map publishers orter put up some of it, anyway.

I will sing you now a song
Of a binder light and strong,
With its bolt holes square and right
So you can bolt 'em all up tight;
And no extra wrench will use
To tighten bolts or screws.

It has a spring balanced reel
Which makes it nice to work;
And it is balanced up so nice
It cuts without a jerk.
It has a nice spring seat
Which makes it nice to ride.

His binder has a great drive wheel 10x34 inches, which makes it run very light. The drver thinks he is on a buggy, but when he sees the bundles roll, and all bound so nice and tight, he sees his mistake. It is the Osborne Columbia Binder. If you need anything in the line of farm implements it will pay you to see these goods before you buy.

THE AUBURN COURIER

OFFICIAL PAPER OF DeKALB COUNTY

JAMES A. BARNS, Editor.

Registered at the Auburn, Indiana Post Office as second-class matter.

THURSDAY,.....APRIL 16, 1896

Prohibition Meeting.

The prohibitionists of DeKalb county will hold their county convention at Auburn, Indiana, April 23, 1896, at 10 a. m. They will also hold their congressional convention on the same date and place, at 1 p. m. All prohibitionists of DeKalb county are cordially invited to attend these meetings. There will be good speaking from various public speakers and we urge a full attendance.

CHARLES ECKHART, -
Chairman Co. Com.

Republican Caucus.

The republican caucus met last evening in the court room and was called to order by Capt. Kuhlman. They organized by electing F. L. Welsheimer, secretary. Nominations being declared in order, the meeting proceeded to select candidates for trustees in the order of their numbers. In the first ward, the names placed before them, were Wm. Sheffer, and D. S. Ober. A ballot was taken, which resulted: Ober 36; Sheffer, 31. Ober was declared the nominee. In the third ward, Mr. Bishop refused to run again, and Ed. Weeks and Charles Bolton were put in nomination. The ballot resulted: Weeks 41; Bolton 30, and Weeks was nominated. In the fourth ward, the present trustee, Isaac Hague, was announced. He asked them to select someone else, as he has had it long enough. But no other name was proposed, and he was chosen by acclamation. John West, the present marshal, had no opposition, and was nominated in the same way, U. S. Raut, was named for clerk, and no other name being called, he was chosen by a unanimous vote. For treasurer there were two persons named, E. D. Beadle and D. A. Hodge. A ballot was taken, which resulted: Beadle, 38; Hodge, 36. So Beadle is the nominee. As there was no further business, the meeting then adjourned.

declare that the YESBERA'S SPECIAL Bicycle is a bird, and a fast flyer at that. Don't take an expert to discover that. For fast riding and easy riding on any kind of a road the YESBERA SPECIAL Bicycle is quite a little ahead. After all, easy riding on a wheel that won't break down is all that ninety-nine people out of one hundred care about. They get what they care about full to overflowing in the YESBERA SPECIAL, that is, if they don't delay too long in getting their orders, for there's a limit of capacity to every bicycle manufactured.
They are on sale at Fred J. Yesbera's Jewelry Store, and so is a full line of Bicycle Repairs. And we do repairing too. Give us a call.

Our Position As The

LEADING DRY GOODS HOUSE OF NORTH-EASTERN IND.,

Will Be Strongly Emphasized This Spring.

More convincing prices that compel recognition of our leadership in value giving prices that plainly demonstrate that we sell at the seasons beginning at the low prices that do not usually come elsewhere until the seasons end.

Our new goods don't have to be marked high to cover losses on "Charge Accounts" that are sure to come later to "Credit Houses." No charge accounts here. People expect to buy cheaper here than anywhere else, and their expectations are always realized. That's why our patronage grows larger every day. Our customers become our best advertisers.

Lindol Calkin, of this city, is the inventor of an oil pump for oiling line shafts which should be classed as a very useful thing, as it does away with the use of a ladder, which is a toilsome and dangerous way of reaching the shaft. We are told that Mr. Miller is in partnership and has secured a patent. Mr. Calkin is a skilled engineer employed in the Auburn Foundry & Machine Works. Mrs. Calkin will be remembered, as a former successful teacher, Miss Lizzie Shippey.

—During the winter of 1883, F. M. Martin' of Long Reach, West Va., contracted a severe cold which left him with a cough. In speaking of how he cured it he says: "I used several kinds of cough syrup but found no relief until I bought a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough remedy, which relieved me almost instantly, and in a short time brought about a complete cure." When troubled with a cough or cold use this remedy and you will not find it necessary to try several kinds before you get relief. It has been in the market for over twenty years and constantly grown in favor and popularity. For sale at 25 and 50 cents per bottle by Davenport the Druggist. 14-18.

—It's all the same, a slight cold, congested lungs or severe cough. One Minute Cough Cure banishes them. Davenport the Druggist.

Surprise.

Last week the friends and neighbors of Ephraim Shipe in Fairfield planned a surprise on him on Tuesday, March 31. It was his 73rd birthday and they managed to get his son, Leonard Shipe to take him over to Ashley and Hudson, so that on his return, he found the house crowded with nearly fifty of the neighbors. A good old-fashioned visit followed, which the old gentleman enjoyed fully with the rest.

The Misses Hattie and Bertha Hollobaugh started for Auburn last Wednesday. When near the residence of J. Baker a dog leaped the fence and scared the colt they were driving. The animal suddenly turned, upsetting the carriage and almost demolishing it. The girls succeeded in in extricating themselves before the colt ran. It was caught a short distance from the accident.

COURT.

Hon. D. R. Best of Steuben county has been chosen to try the case of W. H. Leas administrator of the estate of the late Geo. H. Duncan, against Duncan, May, et al to set aside deed.

A decree of foreclosure is entered up against all defendants in Hayden vs Mulvey, on mortgage.

C. C. Boyer was divorced from Emma Boyer.

The damage case against the Wabash road, for injury to a race horse, took up several days last week. On Thursday, while the trial was far advanced, Wm. Kennedy, one of the jurors was by request ot the plaintiff, withdrawn for some objection, the nature of which we did not know. This step, it seems is very rarely resorted to. The effect in this case was to stop the trial. A motion was entered by Mr. Rose, for defendant, to have all costs up to date, including the costs for a struck jury, taxed up to plaintiff. But the cause is continued to be tried, we suppose, at some future term of court. As Kennedy had to go off, the entire struck jury that was on this case had to be discharged. In a talk with J. E. Rose after writing the above we learn that this unusal proceeding of discharging a juryman after a suit is partly over, comes out of the old English Common Law practice and is very rarely resorted to in legal practice in this country. Moreover, it is his opinion that it can not be properly resorted to except in criminal cases. In this case the plaintiffs will have to pay all costs before a new suit can be commenced.

SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR

THE BEST
SPRING MEDICINE

Is SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR—don't forget to take it. The Liver gets sluggish during the Winter, just like all nature, and the system becomes choked up by the accumulated waste, which brings on Malaria, Fever and Ague and Rheumatism. You want to wake up your Liver now, but be sure you take SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR to do it. It also regulates the Liver—keeps it properly at work, when your system will be free from poison and the whole body invigorated.

You get THE BEST BLOOD when your system is in A1 condition, and that will only be when the Liver is kept active. Try a Liver Remedy once and note the difference. But take only SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR—it is SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR which makes the difference. Take it in powder or in liquid already prepared, or make a tea of the powder; but take SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR. You'll find the RED Z on every package. Look for it.

ANOTHER RUPTURE CURED.

To Whom it May Concern.

WATERLOO, IND., Feb. 18, 1896.

I desire to say to all those afflicted with hernia that it can be cured. I have been ruptured for twenty-five years. For the past number of years I could not keep it in place with the best truss I could procure. I have taken nine treatments from Dr. Caseboer and have now laid aside my truss and believe I am permanently cured. I can heartily recommend the Fidelity treatment to any one afflicted with rupture.

Very Respectfully,
G. T. ABBY,
Cashier DeKalb Bank.

President Kruger is serving his third term and seems to be doing a pretty good job, too.

Perhaps Russia will be the next nation to drop an ultimatum in the slot and make the lion roar.

A tramp was found drowned in a bath tub the other day in Denver. The police are now trying to trace the murderer.

Is anything serious troubling Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany? No arrests for lese-majeste have been reported for a period of fully a week.

If the tramps have anything to say in the proceedings of the anti-tramp convention they will doubtless advocate the adoption of a resolution supporting the good roads movement.

A Russian dispatch says that "the czar has engaged a typewriter and reduced his body guard." If the czarina understands her business the reduction of the body guard probably will not be continued long.

Pennsylvania reports that the value of farms in that State has doubled since 1850. American agriculturists ought to be satisfied, for the value of farms in England has declined nearly one-half in the same period.

It is said that in case of great emergency the United States could put 9,500,000 disciplined men in the field within three months. Uncle Sam can afford to be patient with the mediaeval relics in Spain who have been stoning our consulates.

Herbert Spencer declares that society is advancing to higher forms through the decline of militancy. The philosopher does not explain why the decline is attended by such tremendous preparations for fighting, but this may be one of the favorable symptoms.

In view of the fact that the consumption of the nameless little abominations that are smoked in lieu of pipes and cigars is several billions annually it is hardly a surprise to learn from Kentucky that the largest tobacco planter in the world has failed.

A correspondent who has been looking through the pine regions of Minnesota asked a timberman what his orders were. "Our orders," said the foreman, "are to strip things clean." The old world is indebted to similar instructions in the past for many of its waste and desert places.

The latest estimate of illiterates over 10 years of age in the United States is 6,324,702, or 13.3 per cent. of the whole population. This is a large number, but as the proportion in 1890 was 17 per cent., the public schools of the country may be complimented on their solid growth in usefulness.

Greater New York will have an area of 859 square miles, making it the largest American city and nearly three times the size of Philadelphia. But London spreads over 688 square miles. The consolidation will advance New York to the position of the world's second city, and as its rate of growth is nearly double that of London it should be the first before the end of the coming century.

A London critic calls attention to the fact that "the Englishman has to depend for dictionaries of his own native speech mainly on the labors of American scholars." Several home-made dictionaries have a certain vogue in England, but they are circumscribed and unsatisfactory, and hence the leading American works of that kind, being more comprehensive and including the established speech of the masses as well as the classes, are widely used and relied upon over there.

This country gained its independence by revolution. Students of history are aware that during the trouble Lord Cornwallis came over here and gave notice to the "rebels" that if they did not lay down their arms in eight days he would put them to fire and sword. Cornwallis is dead. He has been dead a long time, and he will be dead a time longer. His threat seems to have been resurrected by Gen. Weyler, the Spanish officer, lately arrived in Cuba. It seems likely that the Cuban patriots will make him sick of the saying before he makes them all kick the bucket.

The militia of the country eligible for service, according to the most recent tabulation, are less than one-seventh of the population. This is quite a reduction in the proportion from colonial times. In his memorable address before the Virginia House of Burgesses Patrick Henry said: "We are three millions of people, one-fifth fighting men." But perhaps Patrick Henry was a better orator than statistician, and he may have reckoned some as fighting men who would not have been so classed under the rules now governing eligibility for service. However, we have sufficient fighting material for all practical purposes. What this country needs now is more peacemakers.

"The difficulty of removing fish bones and similar obstructions impacted at the lower end of the oesophagus is well known. One of the most simple, effectual remedies is to administer a pint of milk, and, forty minutes afterward, an emetic of sulphate of zinc. The fluid easily passes the obstruction, and is, of course, rapidly coagulated in the stomach into a more or less solid mass, which, on being ejected, forces the obstruction before it, and so effects its removal." This is, doubtless, an excellent recipe in some respects; but it is not a pleasant picture, that of a man with a fish bone in his throat, sitting around for three-quarters of an hour waiting to be sick.

A leading American ornithologist says that some of our most desirable birds are threatened with extermination. The common quail and ruffed grouse are becoming very scarce. Wrens and bluebirds are driven from their old haunts by sparrows. Terns are slaughtered by thousands for the millinery business, and Florida is similarly despoiled of its herons, ibis, pelicans and smaller birds. The wild pigeon has disappeared. Fashion at present is the greatest enemy of bird life, but collectors of eggs are also responsible for great destruction. Protection of birds must come through the education of the people, especially the rising generation, and by protective legislation sustained by game wardens. Thus far no State Legislature has given the subject the attention it deserves, and must soon demand if the present ravages continue.

The misfortune of David J. Tucker, of Ottawa County, Kas., is a warning to mankind. It has a significant bearing upon the sociological and political problems of the day which it would be folly to ignore. We know little of David himself except that he is the husband of Lucinda. Whether he staid home and attended to the baby properly and washed the dishes without breaking them, it is impossible to say. But David is heard of at last, in an unenviable light, as a transgressor of the family laws and a victim of condign punishment. He went to town with $32 in his pocket and a list of things to buy at the store. David, however, in a moment of forgetfulness bought red, white and blue chips with the $32, instead of spending it for thread and groceries. The same chips quickly became the property of other sinful men, and David went home without money, thread or groceries. This next chapter is more terrible than the tears and reproaches familiar in other stories of this character. Lucinda failed to weep. She seized David and bound him to a post in the barn. Then she cowhided him and left him to think over his sins. Kansas women were known to be ambitious for power, but a glimpse now has been given of the extent of their aspirations which is appalling. It may be all a mistake to suppose they wanted merely to vote and hold the offices. Or, having suffered reverses in this direction, is it possible Mrs. Tucker is the evangelist of a new anti-masculine crusade? If so, where will it end? Soon we may hear Kansas men are refused the right of going to the lodge without a chaperon, and perhaps they will be placed on an allowance of 10 cents per day for spending money. Bicycles and typewriters will be prohibited under penalty of being tied to a post in the barn and cowhided. Better a thousand times let the women have the offices than to drive them in desperation to such reprisals. Let the men of Kansas take heed that in fleeing from one evil they do not fall afoul of a worse fate.

A man once came to me and paid me a debt of $10 which had stood so long that I had forgotten it, but while I was yet shoutin' his praises as an honest man he borrowed $15 of me and disappeared and I never expect to see him more.

I hev allus noticed that people who argue that they hev but one life to live and should therefore enjoy it manage to kill themselves off as soon as possible, and that without takin' any real pleasure in the few years they exist.

Human natur' is a funny thing. A man will argue for you—fight for you—peril his own life to save yours, and yit some day when his dog chases your cat and you refer to the matter he'll diskiver that you hev allus bin the meanest man on the face of the airth.

I don't argue that the whipping-post makes men better, but statistics fail to show that the same man comes back for a second dose except in rare instances. If it doesn't better him towards the world it certainly makes him afraid of repeating his offense, and that's about the same thing.

If we sit down on a carpet tack there ain't the least doubt that some one is to blame for it and ought to be held responsible. If we remember that we left the tack there ourselves then our only consolation is to hold three or four others in fault to excuse our own negligence.

The idea of gettin' sunthin' for nuthin' seems to hev bin inborn with the best of us, and I don't mind tellin' you that's the reason why I paid a feller a dollar for a fifty-cent jack-knife. He offered to throw in a whet stun' wuth ten cents, and I couldn't let sich a bargin pass me by.

When a man comes to me and says: "Now, Uncle William, you've allus bin my friend and I want some candid advice," I look fur a chance to run away from him. If my advice agrees with his opinion I git no credit, while he feels flattered. If contrary to his ideas he sets me down as an enemy and a crank and we are no longer friends.

Disastrous Famines.

The most disastrous famine which has occurred in modern times was that which prevailed in Northern China in 1877-8. It was so severe that 9,500,000 of the inhabitants perished. The sum of $500,000 was collected and forwarded to China for the relief of the distress caused by it. The famine in India in 1878 caused the death of 3,500,000 people in the Madras district and 2,436,000 people in the Oude district. The potato famine in Ireland in 1846-7 was responsible for over 1,600,000 deaths. In Northwest India, during the famines of 1837-8, over 750,000 persons perished, while in Bengal and Orissa in 1865-6 1,000,000 deaths ensued. Two years afterwards, in Rajpootana over 1,500,000 perished from hunger.

IS NOW MRS. HARRISON

MRS. DIMMICK IS WEDDED TO THE EX-PRESIDENT.

Ceremony Is Modest Enough to Please the Groom and Beautiful Enough to Charm the Bride—Only a Few Guests Are Bidden.

Simple Services.

The marriage of ex-President Benjamin Harrison and Mrs. Mary Scott Lord Dimmick took place in St. Thomas' Protestant Episcopal Church, New York, at 5:30 o'clock Monday afternoon, the Rev. Dr. John Wesley Brown officiating. Two hours later they had left New York, and before noon the next day the bride was installed in her new home at Indianapolis.

This, the most notable wedding of the year in the light of its interest for the whole country, was the quietest. Not more than thirty persons saw the ceremony, and fewer still were bidden to the post-nuptial collation. Only the immediate relatives of Mrs. Dimmick and the lifelong friends of Gen. Harrison who had borne with him the burden of a national government were there. All the members of his immediate family were conspicuously absent. Mrs. Dimmick was given away by her brother-in-law, Lieut. John F. Parker, U. S. N., and Gen. Harrison was supported by Gen. B. F. Tracy, ex-Secretary of the Navy. Two ushers, E. F. Tibbott, the ex-President's private secretary, and Daniel M. Ransdell, sufficed to seat the guests.

Gen. Harrison's ingrained repugnance to anything approaching publicity in relation to his private affairs extended to his matrimonial plans. It mattered not to him that the whole country would read eagerly every detail touching the marriage of one who had walked so many years in the public eye, and who had served in office at the head of the nation. He wanted a quiet wedding, and Mrs. Dimmick was of the same mind. Hence it was that the few bidden to the ceremony were asked to keep secret the hour.

Gen. Harrison left the Fifth Avenue Hotel, accompanied by Gen. Benjamin F. Tracy, in a close carriage, at 5 o'clock and was driven to Rev. Dr. Brown's house on Fifty-third street. They passed through the house to the vestry, where they awaited the coming of the bridal party. The bride left the home of her sister, Mrs. John F. Parker, 40 East Thirty-eighth street, at 5:10 o'clock. She was accompanied by her brother-in-law, Lieut. John F. Parker, who gave her away. They arrived at the entrance at 5:20 o'clock and proceeded to the tower room, where the bridal procession formed. They proceeded to the chancel, where Gen. Harrison, accompanied by his groomsman, Gen. Tracy, received his bride. The ushers, standing to one side, faced the altar as the bride and groom stepped forward to the altar rail, where the rector, Dr. Brown, was waiting, Dr. George William Warren, organist of the church, playing the bridal music from "Lohengrin," and during the entire ceremony playing very softly Mascagni's intermezzo in the "Cavalleria Rusticana."

That portion of the matrimonial service known as the marriage service proper, the recital of which lasts only about fifteen minutes, was used, and immediately the blessing was pronounced Gen. and Mrs. Harrison, followed by Mrs. John F. Parker and Gen. Tracy, Mr. Tibbitt and Mr. Ransdell, Lieut. Parker and Mr. and Mrs. Pinchot, walked down the aisle to the strains of the "Tannhauser" march of Wagner, and entering the carriages waiting at the entrance the bridal party was driven to the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Pinchot, 2 Gramercy Park, where light refreshments were served, and where the party donned traveling attire for the trip to Indianapolis.

Hundreds of valuable presents were received by the couple. Col. E. S. Ferguson sent a silver service; ex-Secretary Tracy's friendly sentiments were embodied in a silver fish service; Gen. and Mrs. Morton sent a silver fruit basket; ex-Secretary Whitney sent two handsome compotiers for bonbons. The present of the bridegroom was a magnificent string of pearls.

The Bride's Life Story.

Mrs. Harrison, who is a small but very graceful woman, of rather dark complexion, and of a very bright and attractive appearance, is related to Gen. Harrison through his late wife, who was her aunt. She was born in Princeton, Pa., where most of her younger life was spent.

Her mother's marriage to Russell F. Lord proved an unhappy one. Soon after the war Mrs. Lord left her husband and joined her father, Dr. Scott, at Indianapolis, Ind., the two daughters going with her. After the return of his daughter to his home in Indianapolis Dr. Scott was called to Springfield, Ill., to take charge of a Presbyterian institution that is now known as Concordia College. Mrs. Lord and her children accompanied him. In 1875, when Dr. Scott left Springfield, Mrs. Lord, with her two children, moved to Princeton, N. J., where for five years Mrs. Dimmick attended a Princeton day boarding school managed by Mrs. Moffitt, wife of one of the professors of the theological school. Later she attended the female college at Elmira, N. J.

(In which Ex-President Harrison was married.)

MRS. BENJAMIN HARRISON.

It was in Princeton that Mamie Lord became acquainted with Walter Erskine Dimmick, and two years later they ran away and were married, their efforts to reconcile their relatives to the union having proved unavailing. Young Dimmick was the son of Samuel E. Dimmick, one of the leading lawyers of northern Pennsylvania, whose large fortune was left to his three sons. Their honeymoon was hardly ended before Mr. Dimmick was stricken with typhoid fever. His young bride nursed him with such devotion and tenderness as only the noblest natures can put forth. Day and night she was at his bedside, but the dread disease was relentless, and on Jan. 16, 1882, three months after marriage, Walter Dimmick died.

After the death of her mother, in 1890, she went to New York city to live with her sister, Mrs. John F. Porter. She spent some considerable time at the White House during Gen. Harrison's administration, and was a great favorite with her aunt, the late Mrs. Harrison.

General Harrison's Career.

Gen. Benjamin Harrison was born in North Bend, O., in August, 1833. He is a grandson of W. H. Harrison, eighth President of the United States. After graduating from a law school in 1853 he was married in Indianapolis to the late Mrs. Harrison. In 1860 he was elected official reporter of the Supreme Court of Indiana. In 1862 he raised a regiment, the Seventieth Indiana, went into the field as colonel and served through a number of important engagements with distinction. He was breveted brigadier general before the close of the war.

HARRISON'S INDIANAPOLIS HOME.

On his return to Indianapolis at the close of the war he was re-elected official court reporter. One year later he returned to the practice of law, and in 1876, when the regular nominee withdrew shortly before the election, the nomination was forced upon Gen. Harrison for the governorship. He was defeated by a narrow majority. In 1880 he was elected to the United States Senate from Indiana and served one term, and in 1888 he was elected President of the United States.

NOTES ON EDUCATION.

MATTERS OF INTEREST TO PUPIL AND TEACHER.

Daily Practical Training in Manners—Use of the Hektograph in School—Classes Should Sit Near the Teacher—Good Drill on Sounds.

Practical Training in Manners.

Ask the children daily to tell what opportunity they have improved of being kind and polite.

The teacher should remark on any improvement shown by the pupils, and lead pupils to talk of it. It is well to allow them to talk without restraint, so as to obtain their real opinions. Tact will be needed to ward off a feeling of self-gratulation or conceit, which may otherwise be brought out when pupils tell of their own polite acts.

Impress pupils with the idea that good manners is one of the subjects pursued in the schools, and that it will help them in life, and that practice shows progress in this particular branch.

Without seeming to demand it, teachers should lead children to offer them any service that is not menial. Such attentions as disposing of wraps, umbrellas, etc., fetching them when needed, picking up things accidentally dropped, handing crayon, eraser, etc., lifting or moving things, offering a chair, helping to put things in their places at the close of school, should be rendered to teachers by pupils. If, at first, in order to make children see what offices are proper the teacher must ask for them, it should be as one would ask an equal, and not a servant; and any service rendered should be most politely acknowledged.

The older children should be made to understand the propriety of assuming some responsibility over the younger. This is almost universally practiced in schools where "busy work" is done, when the older pupils help to distribute materials for such work, and to assist in its execution. They should also assist those who need aid in putting on or taking off wraps, overshoes, etc. Children should understand that girls need not assist girls and boys, boys, but that help should be offered and accepted, as is convenient.

Pupils should be trained to receive and entertain those who come to visit the schools. They should entertain as politely in a schoolroom as in a parlor. When visitors come, a pupil should answer the bell, politely invite the company to enter, find them comfortable seats, take their wraps if they wish to dispose of them, and offer any other attention the occasion may seem to demand. To do this properly at the time implies previous training—pupils acting as visitors. In this as in other things, officiousness on the part of pupils should be guarded against. Give opportunities to all pupils in turn to show these attentions.

In the discipline of the school, when children have had training in good manners, the question "Is this polite?" will oftentimes prove more effectual than a severe reprimand. This has been demonstrated by actual experience even in schools difficult of control.—North Carolina Teacher.

The Hektograph.

The problem of furnishing supplementary reading matter to the voracious mind of the "young idea" of to-day, is most easily solved by the use of this simple medium of reproduction, which is cheaper than any of the other "graps" or "styles" on the market. Moreover, it can be made by any teacher for the trifling cost of 75 cents:

Required:

1 pint of glycerine	.35
4 ounces gelatine	.20
1 tin pan 8x12	.20
Total cost	.75

Dissolve the gelatine in a pint of cold water. Then add the glycerine. Put upon the stove, stirring that it may not burn. When it comes to a boil pour in a shallow tin pan to cool. Beware of air bubbles and you will have a smooth, hard, sticky surface. A shallow caramel pan with upturned edges is just what is desired in the way of a pan. Eight by twelve inches, the suggested dimensions, correspond with those of the blocks of unglazed paper sold for the hektograph.

Directions: Use hektograph ink and a coarse stub pen. See that every stroke of the pen shows a green metallic luster when dry, else the work will not "take." Write or print the reading matter to be used and when the ink is quite dry lay the sheet face down upon the hektograph. Press gently over the whole surface with the hand or a soft cloth. After from two to five minutes (according to the number of copies desired) gently peel the paper off. From the impression thus made, reproduce all the copies required, laying one sheet of paper on the surface at a time.

The lack of suitably graded reading matter is a source of great anxiety to the teacher still, in spite of the numerous supplementary readers published almost daily. In fact, the problem is so purely individual that material varies with almost every school. But equipped with a hektograph a teacher may gather in every field, and where other resources fail she can originate her own stories and multiply her effort. The reading matter which thus passes through the hands of the children can hardly be measured, and there is no limit to the culture obtained by contact with the best our best men and women have said, on all the varied subjects of the modern course of study.

So at the risk of purple fingers—which may be easily cleansed with pumice stone—make yourself a hektograph and there will be one burden the less, as the horror of scarcity of reading matter rolls from your shoulders.—Elizabeth V. Brown, in the School Journal.

The Theoretical Boy and the Real Boy.

A few days ago I heard a teacher giving her experience in trying to utilize a suggestion found in a school journal. She said:

"I read in one of my papers a piece entitled 'One Teacher's Successful Management of a Difficult Case.' It told how a teacher, who had in her department a disorderly boy of nineteen, won him over to docility by kindness. His teacher brought all the love and tenderness of her vehement nature to bear on the lad. One day, the boy created a great disturbance and also made a failure of every recitation throughout the entire morning. At noon, the teacher mildly requested him to remain where he was, and complete his unfinished tasks, which he refused to do marching from the room with the others at the signal of dismissal.

The teacher went to him as he stood with his comrades in the yard, and sweetly asked, "Haven't you forgotten something, Harry?" The boy hung his head in shame and was about to return to his seat, when he was informed that it wasn't necessary and was requested to go home. He reluctantly departed, returning the following morning, and with tears of penitence besought the pardon of the teacher and the school.

"Well, I had a rough disorderly boy in school. I asked him to finish neglected work, which, as in the case noted, he refused to do. I took the next step, and told him to keep his seat while the others enjoyed their intermission; he left with the rest. I started to him as he was enjoying himself with his playmates.

"Here my program began to vary from the original. My boy did not display symptoms of remorse and shame. He yelled lustily and ran from me. To overtake him was impossible, so I called to him in as sweet a tone as in my breathless state I could muster, 'Did—you—not—forget—something, Freddie?' The fellow stopped, turned and stared in open-mouthed astonishment a moment, then called back 'None of your business!' 'I guess you'd better go home,' I called after him, just as his white hair and ragged hat disappeared around a distant curve in the road.

"Well, my boy didn't return in penitence and tears next day, but his mother came instead, and what a terrible time I had with her. Her unkind remarks still haunt my memory. Freddie never came back. I lost considerable influence and reputation on account of this unfortunate episode.

"If I had not subscribed for and read that school journal in which I found the story about Harry I would have avoided the trouble with Freddie. I have made up my mind to let my subscriptions all run out, and after this paddle my own canoe."

The teacher who discoursed as above has one important lesson to learn. Theories are general, but the art of teaching must vary with individuals, and each case should be treated on its own merits. What is taught in normal schools, institutes and educational papers should be digested and adapted, not "swallowed whole," do or apted.—Mary A. Carver, in the Western Teacher.

Do Not Simplify Too Much.

We do not believe that in order to make the school work pleasant to the pupil everything must be made easy. The healthy child likes a sugar plum occasionally, but does not want all his food sugar coated. It is not easy play that is attractive to the robust boy. He spurns it, and chooses that which calls forth all his power. He delights in the consciousness of physical power. So, too, there is a joy in the severest mental effort, if it be but rightly directed and successful. Every true teacher must have watched with keen satisfaction the play of the child mind as shadowed on the countenance. He delights to mark the clouded face, the downcast eye, while the struggle for the mastery of some uncomprehended sentence or problem is going on, and to see these quickly give place to the flushed cheek, the shining forehead, and the flashing eye, which tell of victory achieved. One aim of the wise teacher will be to develop this sense of power in the child. He will seek not so much to remove obstacles out of the way as to teach the young thinker how to meet and overcome them.—Educational Journal.

As Good as a Game.

As good as a game to the lowest class is a lesson on changing words. It is a good drill on the sounds, and may be used with advantage occasionally.

The class is, of course, at the black board, chalk and brush on the ledge for use, and every pupil should try and be able to make the change as soon as the word is mentioned. Hands may be raised to denote their readiness.

Suppose the word top be taken as a beginning. The teacher says, "Change it to stop." Up go the hands at once. One scholar is selected to make the change. If he does it correctly, the hands go down again. "Change to shop" is the next problem, then shod, shed, and so it goes on through, bed, bad, bat, sat, slat, slap, steep, creep, screen, etc.

A second plan consists in the teacher making the change, while the children recognize and tell her the word.

A seat exercise may also be given by starting with a word such as mit, or man, and changing only one letter at a time. Make as many words as possible.

Shorten Up Your Rope.

Let your classes sit near you. I would have every pupil in my class sit within reach of my hand if possible. Attention, like the force of gravity, varies inversely as the square of the distance. Whenever I see a teacher trying to hear a recitation from a pupil twenty feet away from her I want to say, "Shorten up your rope and your load will pull more easily." That is good physics and metaphysics.—Exchange.

Rats.

Place a water-tight barrel in a dark corner, making the top accessible to the rats by setting boxes near it, or placing boards or poles so that they may climb up. The head is taken out, and the barrel filled about three-fourths full with trash, corncobs, chips, etc. On top of this put anything to entice the rats. After they become familiar with the surroundings and resort to it regularly, clean out the barrel, fill it about three-fourths full of water, throw in enough chaff to cover the water, and put in a small block with a piece of bacon tacked on each side. The first rat will jump in to eat the bacon, the next one will not hesitate, and then there is a fight for the possession of the block. The noise brings others rats, and when they get in—no matter how many—they will drown. Allow them to visit the barrel for a week at least before the water is put in.

THE LOCAL ELECTIONS

TOWNS AND CITIES IN SEVERAL STATES ELECT OFFICERS.

Lines Drawn on Local Issues—Republicans Carry Milwaukee by Reduced Majority—License Men Win in Many Wisconsin Towns.

Battle of Little Ballots.

Municipal elections were held Tuesday in Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Ohio, Kansas, Nebraska and Missouri. In the city of Chicago about 50 per cent of the total vote was polled. In the aldermanic elections party lines were generally disregarded. A bitter fight was waged to prevent the re-election of boodle aldermen, and regardless of party the Civic Federation and the Municipal Voters' League indorsed thirty-three men, candidates in twenty-seven wards. Of these, twenty-two were elected. There now remain in the Council, of men who are known to be thieves and boodlers, only twenty-seven, of whom all but five are hold-overs. The entire Council numbers sixty-eight, so for the first time in many years Chicago has a Board of Aldermen the majority of whom are believed to be honest. Springfield Republicans elected six out of seven aldermen, and in the township elections throughout Sangamon County the Republicans retained their majority in County Boards of Supervisors.

In Milwaukee all of the candidates on the Republican city ticket were elected, but the Democrats made large gains. The most noticeable feature of the election, which passed off quietly, was the heavy Populist vote which was cast. Eighty-seven precincts show 6,010 votes for Henry Smith, the Populist candidate for Mayor. This is double the total vote cast by the party two years ago. In the State at large R. D. Marshal is re-elected associate justice of the Supreme Court.

Contests in Minnesota towns in most cases were purely local, with little politics in them. However, there were in some cases other interests. Fairbault elected P. F. Ruge, Democrat, Mayor, and nearly the entire Democratic ticket, being the first time they have done so for many years. At Anoka, C. T. Woodbury, without his own knowledge or consent, was put up to run independently against the regular Republican nominee and Woodbury was elected.

In the Long Island town elections there was great interest in the liquor question, as all of the towns voted on the optional clause in the Raines law. The party result was even up. Queens County was carried by the Democrats; Suffolk County by Republicans. There are no longer town elections in Kings, all being merged in Brooklyn. License carried the day everywhere. The new Board of Supervisors in Queens County will be five Democrats to two Republicans. The Democratic ticket was successful at Newtown, the vote completely reversing the order of things of the election last year.

Returns from the elections in cities of the first and second class in Kansas show little of general political interest. Republican tickets were put up generally and carried with little opposition, but citizens' tickets, based solely on municipal questions, were ably supported and won in a dozen cases.

In most of the cities and towns of Colorado, aside from Denver and Pueblo, elections were held. The contests were entirely on local issues. In many of the smaller towns the liquor question was the one at issue, and almost invariably the temperance element won. The women were well represented at the polls everywhere.

Throughout Missouri party lines were not closely drawn, but in a majority of cities where such was the case the Democrats elected the whole or the greater part of their tickets. The Democrats carried Cuba, Bismarck, Marshfield, Higginsville, Monroe City and Nevada. The result was mixed at Wellsville, Golden City and Clinton. Non-partisan tickets were in the field at Slater and Holden. In Fayette the citizens' ticket was victorious. Carthage was carried by the Republicans.

In the Nebraska municipal elections a heavy vote was polled. A general disposition was manifested to disregard party lines. The issue was high license, and in a majority of cases was carried.

The Democrats were successful in all townships in Arkansas save Newport and Jonesboro, where the Republicans elected their tickets.

A TEXAS GIRL'S PLIGHT.

She Has a Grafted Ear that Will Not Stop Growing.

There is in Chicago at the present time a young lady being treated by a surgeon whose case is one of the strangest, as it is the only one of its kind on record. The young lady is Miss Zury Knox, and she is the daughter of a prominent citizen of Yoakum County, Texas. She is a most beautiful girl of perfect figure, a brilliant conversationalist, a proficient musician and an artist of no mean ability.

When 7 years of age Miss Knox was thrown from a pony in such a manner as to pull off the upper portion of her right ear. The remainder of the ear was so badly lacerated that most of it was cut away by a surgeon in Dallas. She had only a small amount of her ear left, which soon healed up, and she was able to cover the disfigurement with her hair. She paid no particular attention to the organ, as the hearing was but slightly affected, up to one year ago. Then she met a young lady from Chicago who advised her to consult a surgeon, who, she believed, could replace the missing ear by a grafting process. Miss Knox accepted her friend's advice, went to Chicago and returned home with an ear which, while not nearly so pink and dainty as its mate, served the purpose well enough.

Shortly after she got home the ear began to grow and it has been growing ever since. It does not grow in any one particular way, but shoots out in every conceivable manner. One who saw it a few days ago says it looks like a slice of dried apple about as big as John L. Sullivan's hand. A peculiar feature of the ear is that she can hear sounds with it that are totally undistinguishable to other persons. There is a continual roar in the ear "like the screeching of a thousand steamboat whistles," as she describes it, and the young lady was obliged to have her room in her Texas home padded in order to keep out the slightest noise, which was magnified 1,000 times through the grafted ear. At last she could stand it no longer and set out for Chicago to have it either repaired or cut off.

The rear portion of the Tenth Street Methodist Episcopal Church at Omaha dropped a couple of feet while services were in progress. The church was crowded and for a time a fearful panic seemed imminent, especially as the stoves were on that part of the floor that was sinking. No one was injured, though there was screaming for several minutes.

MRS. GOOLD'S GRATITUDE

HOW SHE WAS RESTORED TO HEALTH.

Condition Before and After the Birth of Her Child.

From every city, town and hamlet on this vast continent, come letters from suffering women; from those whose physicians have been unable to assist them, or from that numberless class whose confidence in Mrs. Pinkham's advice and the curative properties of her Vegetable Compound is unbounded.

Every letter received from women is recorded, and hundreds of volumes of cases treated aid in furnishing practical information for the women of to-day. No letters are published without the request of the writer. The strictest confidence is observed. The following letter represents thousands:—

"I always enjoyed good health until six months before the birth of my babe. Then I was very weak; my back ached all the time. My physicians said I would be all right after the birth of the child, but I was not, although at that time I had the best of care. The pains in my back were almost unbearable. I had leucorrhœa in its worst form; menstruations were painful.

"Any work or care would entirely unnerve me. When my babe was 11 months old, friends persuaded me to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Before I had taken one bottle I felt the effects. My back did not ache so badly, and I felt stronger. After taking four bottles I felt well. My ambition returned, menstruations were painless, leucorrhœa entirely cured, and I could take care of my babe and do my housework. I shall always recommend your Vegetable Compound for all women, especially for young mothers."—MRS. H. L. GOOLD, Oregon, Wis.

If Mrs. Goold had been well before the birth of her child, subsequent suffering would have been avoided. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound should always be taken before and after birth, in order that the system may withstand the shock.

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills, which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge, that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, laxatives or other remedies are then not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

WERE KINGS OF THE BORDER.

Thrilling Episodes in the Lives of the James Boys.

Frank James, the surviving brother of that brace of bandits known on the border as the James boys, is a doorkeeper in a St. Louis theater. He is a free man. After his dramatic surrender to Governor Crittenden of Missouri Frank James never committed another crime. Those that were charged to him were not prosecuted too far. Some people know why. Not a court in Missouro before which he appeared ever passed sentence upon him, although he was so accused that not a single virtue was credited as an offset to his charged crimes and accusations. He was never captured, although there were prices upon his head in more States than one and sent a message to Governor Crittenden claiming the reward for killing Jesse James. The news of the assassination of a President could not have caused more excitement in Missouri, although the feeling was of a different character.

FRANK JAMES.

The Fords were arrested and released. They got their reward. One of them was killed in a dancehouse in Colorado later, and the other died of consumption. The chase was over. Frank James, as explained in the beginning of this article, was surrendered to the Governor of Missouri, and when the Governor quit office and resumed the practice of law, Frank James was his messenger.

THE RIDE FOR LIFE.

and by corporations that never could be swayed by appeal or influence. This bandit only gave himself up when he was assured that his own terms would be accepted. And then he rode to the boundary of the State capital of Missouri, tied his horse to a fence, and in the company of one man, who had the authority of the Governor, he walked down the main street of the town to the mansion of the executive, up the steps and into the office, and there took off his belt and pistols and cartridges and spurs and sententiously said that he was tired. That event is so recent that the newspaper readers of to-day do not think it necessary to recall the date.

Frank and Jesse James stayed in Missouri and Kansas "and round about," settling old scores, and becoming terrors to travelers. They went into Nebraska and robbed a bank. They were chased out and rode across the State by night. Frank had been wounded in the fight, and was sick nearly unto death. He could not sit on his horse. Besides, two horses in a flight are sometimes unhandy. Jesse placed Frank in front, his body hanging equally poised over the pommel of the saddle. Thus they rode by night, hiding in the thickets or the grass by the day, until they reached Missouri.

The price put upon the heads of the James "boys" by the State and by express companies, and the tactics of the Pinkertons to capture them, are still fresh history on the "border."

The Governor of Missouri, T. T. Crittenden, law partner of Senator Cockrell, and now consul general to Mexico, offered a reward for the James boys, dead or alive, and the railroads offered $10,000. There had traveled with the James boys two men known as the Ford brothers. Their hands were as red as those of the Jameses, but there was a feud between them about the division of booty. The Fords went to live with Jesse James, who, under an assumed name, had rented a cottage in St. Joseph, Mo. Why Jesse James ever entrusted himself thus to the Fords has been a mystery to his friends. For years Jesse James had never failed to wear his pistol where it was handy. One day, however, he laid it aside in his cottage and stood upon a chair to brush the dust from a picture on the wall. This trivial and womanly act in the life of a man who had helped to spread desolation, and who had shot, plundered and killed, cost him his life. The Fords had been watching for their chance. The big reward quickened their courage. One of them shot and killed the bandit.

MRS. SAMUELS, MOTHER OF THE JAMES BOYS.

The Fords went to the telegraph office and sent a message to Governor Crittenden claiming the reward for killing Jesse James. The news of the assassination of a President could not have caused more excitement in Missouri, although the feeling was of a different character.

APOLLO OF CONGRESS.

Wallace T. Foote, Jr., the Handsomest Man in Congress.

Congressman Wallace T. Foote, Jr., of Port Henry, New York, has been voted the handsomest man in Congress. Mr. Foote has had a dangerous rival in the person of Congressman Charles Bennett, of Brooklyn, but feminine Washington has at last decided in favor of the man from Port Henry, and so he has been named the Apollo of the lower house. Bennett, of Brooklyn, has a fine figure and is a fashion plate in dress. Foote is at least three inches under Bennett, but of a heavier build.

WALLACE T. FOOTE, JR.

He dresses quite as well as Bennett, but the latter is bachelor, which was at first considered greatly in his favor, for Foote is a married man. Bennett's mustache is curly and blonde; Foote's dark and graceful. The eyes of Bennett are steel blue; Foote's dark and expressive. The hair it was which settled the matter and turned the victory over to Foote. Mr. Foote has a nobly shaped head covered with masses of wavy, tumbling, prematurely gray hair. It tosses picturesquely about his head and is altogether quite irresistible. Mr. Foote is a lawyer. A few years ago he married Miss Mary Witherbee, a daughter of a very wealthy iron family in the neighborhood of Port Henry. Mrs. Foote does not reside in Washington. She is an invalid. The Apollo of Congress and his former rival, Mr. Bennett, live at one hotel.

NEW YORK'S CITY HALL.

Plans for a New Building Adopted Despite the Lack of Funds.

The eleventh annual exhibition of the Architectural League of New York closed the other evening with an exhibition of the prize plans, made three years ago, for the new city hall. In 1893 the Legislature passed an act creating a board for the approval of designs for a new city hall on the site of the present one and appropriating $17,000 to be distributed among the architects competing. Seven thousand dollars was to be given to the architect submitting the best plan and the sum of $2,000 was to be given to each of five others submitting what the committee believed to be the next best plans. A year after the passage of the act appropriating the money the Legislature decided that New York did not need a new municipal building in City Hall Park and the project was abandoned. The agreement with the architects had to be kept, however, and six weeks ago the award for the prize plans was made. The prize plan provides for a five-story edifice with mansard roof and resembles in general appearance any one of a dozen buildings throughout the country. The structure would occupy all the space covered by the present city hall and make a horseshoe, inside of which the present county courthouse would be hidden except from the Chambers street side.—New York Journal.

LATEST CONSUMPTION CURE.

Edson Seems to Have Solved the Important Question

If the Edson consumption cure realizes what is expected of it then that New York scientist will save more lives in the next year than were lost during the four years of the war of the rebellion. In the entire United States the total deaths from the various forms of tuberculosis amounted to 289,000 in 1895. In the entire world it is probable that somewhere in the neighborhood of 2,500,000 died from the disease in the same year. Edson's remedy is the only one whose results have been practically successful. Edson, by flushing the entire system with a solution of carbolic acid, is the first to actually kill consumption germs. It should be explained, however, that even Edson must ever remain hopeless before many cases of the disease in an advanced stage.

ADMINISTERING THE CURE.

Dr. Edson's laboratory on Whitehall street, New York City, where for months he has been secretly working at his experiments, is a queer place, full of strange glass instruments and mysteries. On the wall of the laboratories above a "gang" of great, glass flasks, heated by flaring gas, boil bubblingly and drip their evaporations through slender tubes into sinuous glass "worms" below, through which the product is distilled into still other flasks. The fluid begins yellow and dingy, but the drops which fall slowly into the bottom flasks are clear and sparkling as the Koh-i-noor. A long table near by is covered with a cluster of retorts and testing tubes, picturesque enough for the days of alchemistry. It is with them that Dr. Edson and Chemist Balch first prepare the ingredients which they afterward set to killing the microbes of consumption. About fifty ounces of the finished fluid can at present be produced daily in this strange place on Whitehall street. Dr. Edson hopes that the capacity of the laboratory may be increased before long.

"The injection," Dr. Edson states, "is given with a hypodermic syringe, under the skin of the abdomen generally, but it may be administered almost anywhere. So long as the needle reaches subcutaneous of dreolo tissue not in the neighborhood of large blood vessels, it is not important where it is placed. Of course, the object of injection is to have the fluid absorbed by the blood, but the best results seem to come when the absorption is comparatively slow."

THE MANX CAT.

It Is Rightly Termed the Oddest of the Whole Feline Order.

The oddest of all felines is the Manx cat, which is, as its name implies, a native of the Isle of Man. One of its peculiarities is that it has no tail. Then, it is much larger, stronger and fiercer than the domestic cat. It has a bigger head, its hair is coarser and thicker and its hind legs, besides being larger, are formed almost like those of a hare.

This cat, although making its home among men, is still very shy, rejecting all friendly advances and being very apt to bite the hand that offers it a caress. It exists for the most part out of doors and is almost wholly self-supporting. It is a fine hunter, not only catching rats, but rabbits, hares and birds as well.

In regard to its being tailless, a writer states that the peculiarity, in all probability, originated in some disease of the caudal appendage, resulting from the dampness of the soil and the humidity of the climate. The effect of the disease was the rotting off of the tail and in time, it is supposed, it became hereditary.

As to the hind legs of the cat it is thought they became longer in obedience to the requirements of the creature's life, its home originally being among the hills, to which it fled on the approach of danger. Its long hind legs enable it to easily run up high hills while pursued by enemies.

The Rack, the Thumbscrew and the Boot

Were old-fashioned instruments of torture long since abandoned, but there is a tormentor who still continues to agonize the joints, muscles and nerves of many of us. The rheumatism, that inveterate foe to daily and nightly comfort, may be conquered by the timely and steady use of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which likewise eradicates neuralgia, bilious, malarial, bowel, stomach and nerve complaint.

Sweden's Fire Lassies.

The little town of Nasso, in Sweden, has a feminine department, 150 strong, in its fire brigade. The water works of the village consist simply of four great tubs, and it is the duty of the women "firemen" to keep these full in case of fire. They stand in two continuous lines from the tubs to the lake, about three blocks away, one line passing the full buckets and the other sending them back.

President Isaac Lewis of Sabina, Ohio, is highly respected all through that section. He has lived in Clinton County 75 years, and has been president of the Sabina Bank twenty years. He gladly testifies to the merit of Hood's Sarsaparilla, and what he says is worthy attention. All brain workers find Hood's Sarsaparilla peculiarly adapted to their needs. It makes pure, rich, red blood, and from this comes nerve, mental, bodily and digestive strength.

"I am glad to say that Hood's Sarsaparilla is a very good medicine, especially as a blood purifier. It has done me good many times. For several years I suffered greatly with pains of in one eye and about my temples, especially at night when I had been having a hard day of physical and mental labor. I took many remedies, but found help only in Hood's Sarsaparilla, which cured me of rheumatism, neuralgia and headache. Hood's Sarsaparilla has proved itself a true friend. I also take Hood's Pills to keep my bowels regular, and like the pills very much." ISAAC LEWIS, Sabina, Ohio.

RIPANS TABULES

H. J. Martin, of 702 T street, N. W., Washington, D. C., in a recent interview had with him by Mr. H. D. Brodie, of the Washington Chronicle, said: "Having suffered for many years with dyspepsia, indigestion and biliousness, I tried every known remedy, consulted many physicians with the hope of getting cured or even relief, but nothing seemed to relieve me. After meals I would feel as if a ball of lead was lodged in my stomach, tired and listless, as though life was scarcely worth living. Finally I was attracted to the ad of Ripans Tabules, and concluded to try them. After taking the first two or three I was surprised to find the relief they gave, and by the time I emptied the first box I felt like a new man. I have never been without Ripans Tabules since, nor have I ever suffered since. I heartily and earnestly recommend them to any one suffering as I did."

Ripans Tabules are sold by druggists, or by mail if the price (50 cents a box) is sent to The Ripans Chemical Company, No. 10 Spruce Street, New York. Sample vial, 10 cents.

The Failure Of Congress

From The St. Louis Globe (Republican.)

A New York paper has been interviewing merchants and business men in the principal commercial centers of the country as to the influences which have checked the favoring prospects of trade that prevailed last fall. The general opinion thus obtained is to the effect that the explanation lies mainly in the course that has been pursued by congress. That body had a fine opportunity to promote the revival of business, to restore confidence, and to encourage enterprise. The people looked to it for sound and practical legislation on subjects vitally related to the question of national prosperity. It assembled with perfect understanding of what was expected of it. The November elections had left no room for doubt about the popular desire with regard to measures of relief and stimulation. Every member knew what his constituents wanted, and how they could be benefited. But the important duty of carrying out the well-defined and well-emphasized will of of the people was treated with indifference, and subordinated to comparatively light and irrelevant considerations. The business interests of the land waited for helpful legislation only to be disappointed. Instead of the assistance that they had anticipated, they got a kind of treatment that was enervating and dispiriting, and all of their sunny calculations were more or less eclipsed. It is a notorious fact that the session has been principally devoted to speech-making upon topics having little or nothing to do with the material welfare of the country. This abundance of vocal deliverance has not served to turn a single one of the idle wheels in the factories, or to furnish work for a single unemployed laborer, or add a cent to the profits of any kind of a trader.... Bills intended to improve financial conditions and accelerate business operations have been slaughtered without mercy, or thrust aside by parliamentry strategy. It is no wonder, therefore, that the gratifying prospects of trade which existed last fall have failed to maintain their brightness. Congress has done nothing to better the situatipn and hasten the return of good times; and the country now contemplates it only with an anxious hope for its adjournment as soon as possible.

Tin Plate.

This new industry is going right ahead, as might be expected when Americans undertake to do a thing. The quarterly review of the American tin plate manufacturing industry, published in the Metal Workers this week shows that seventy-three firms are now engaged or are ready to engage in the manufacture of tin plates in the United States. Thirty-four of these concerns are what is known as dipping plants, which merely coat black steel plates purchased in the market and finish them into tin plates. The remaining thirty-nine concerns are tin plate works proper, that is to say, plants which roll and coat their own steel sheets. These thirty-nine works possess an aggregate of 172 hot mills used for manufacturing the black steel plates, which when coated constitute tin plates. In the first quarter of the year seventeen such mills were added to the works, increasing their annual capacity by over 500,000 boxes and bringing the present potential capacity of American tin plate mills up to about 5,200,000 boxes a year. Thus American tin plate manufacturers are now in a position to fill the whole consumptive demand for tin plates in the United States, apart from that proportion used by the packers and oil trade, which enjoying the advantage of a rebate duty, is still held by the Welsh trade.

THE HABITS OF CHILDREN

Should be closely watched and regulated by mothers. Carelessness in childhood often leads to serious troubles in after life. The digestive organs and bowels should be kept in the best possible condition to insure good health, not only for the present, but for years to come. BUTLER.

Last Week—

A sister of Mrs. Charles Potter, of Iowa, is visiting her. She formerly resided in Butler, but has been away many years.

The many friends of Thomas Rudd and wife gave them a rousing good bye party at the Odd Fellows hall last Tuesday evening. The hall was well filled by our best citizens, their wives and daughters and a very enjoyable occasion was had. Cake and ice cream were served and some entertaining after supper speeches indulged in. The festivities were rudely interrupted by the ominous scream of the fire whistle. The fire was located in a little dwelling on the south side, owned by Frank Bills and occupied by E. E. Vogleson, a teacher at Oak Hill. The house was badly damaged and the household goods well soaked with water. Mr. Vogleson's were at a show at the opera house and failed to appear during the fire. They had some insurance with J. A. Campbell. Mr. Bills had no insurance. The cause of fire unknown.

Florence Campbell's little friends to the number of a dozen or more, gathered at her home last Tuesday to celebrate her ninth birthday. They brought her a number of nice little presents and had an enjoyable time.

Jacob Ginder is very poorly, with meager hopes of his recovery.

CORUNNA.

The political pot is beginning to sizzle.

Elmer Bachtel, of Auburn, was in Corunna over Sunday.

Mort Loomis and wife have settled down to housekeeping in Frank Moody's property.

Gilbert Showers, who was stricken with paralysis on the 4th inst, died on Wednesday, and was buried on Friday the 10th. Funeral services by Rev. Yeager, at Showers' corners.

Doug Wallace has moved into the property of Mrs. Chaffee, south of the east bridge.

George Cox and wife of Garrett were in town last week, the guests of Mrs. Cox's parents.

David Shook was at home last Friday and Saturday on a two days' furlough.

Hank Calkins moved over to Garrett on Monday of this week. He has secured a job in the shops of the B. & O. Co.

James Finch, commenced, last week, taking the enumeration of the school children of Richland township.

Marshal Zwilling laid aside his official regalia the other day long enough to paint a large sign for Milo Thomas. He did a first-class job of it, too.

The meetings at the U. B. church are growing in interest. Evidently Rev. Yeager is a great revivalist.

We came very near having another dandy little lawsuit last week from Garrett, but for some reason it was postponed.

We're Ahead.

England is now buying large quantities of pig iron made at Birmingham, Alabama. It is now recognized that iron can be made at less cost in Alabama than in any other place in the world; and it is illustrated by the fact that England is buying there and shipping the product over four thousand miles. The English iron makers are complaining about it and some of them want a tariff put on iron to protect them against the pauper labor of America.

Mrs. Isaac Brant.

It will be sad news to many of our people, especially the older ones, to learn the death of Mrs. Harriet Brant wife of Hon. Isaac Brant at their home in Des Maines, Iowa. She died Sunday evening, March 29, at the age of 67, They married Nov. 1, 1849, and were well known in Auburn, where he had held the office of sheriff. He was a brother of the late George Brant, of this place, and since their removal to Iowa, thirty-eight years ago, they have been very prominent people, he having been a term or two state treasurer. They have four children, Amos W., Geo. W., Olive C. and William R. Mr. Brant, in a letter to Mrs. George Brant and her daughter, Mrs. McKay, says his wife had the grip about four years ago, and since that time would have seasons of poor health. Dropsy finally set in, and proved fatal. From the clippings of several DesMoines papers, it is seen they were held in high esteem and the funeral was largely attended, the papers agreeing it was the largest ever held in that city. Their home is an elegant one, at the edge of the city, and is known as "Cherry Place." In addition to the regular services at the funeral, a lady friend of Mrs Brant read a very able paper, reciting many of the incidents of her life, and the salient points of her character. All the papers speak of her is a woman of noble attributes.

DIED

Of scarlet fever at the home of Jacob Walters, little Clarence Leroy Walters only child of Sylvester and Kate Walters of Maquoketa, Iowa. Clarence was born in DeKalb Co., Jackson township Ind., Sept. 27, 1892, and departed this life April 9, 1896, aged 4 years, 6 months and 13 days. Mr. Walters with his little son left home several weeks ago for a visit with friends at this place. Shortly after arriving, the boy took sick, the mother was sent for and all was done for the little sufferer that kind and loving hands could do but to no avail, and about two o'clock Thursday morning he passed peacefully away. Interment took place Friday at 2:00 p. m. in Woodlawn. Clarence was a beautiful child and loved by all who knew him, his suffering was borne with patience that would have done credit to one for older. May the sorrowing friends be able to say, Father, not my will, but Thine be done. Luke XXII 22.

School Census.

The enumeraton of school children for the incorporated town of Auburn is now going on and a unique feature of the transaction, is, that it is being made by a lady. We believe this is the first time such a thing has been done in the county or possibly in the state. Mrs. W. H. Rakestraw will call on all our families within a few days now and ask you how many children you have between the ages of 6 and 21. Give her the full answer, and also as to what other persons, if any, you have who belong to the family, or who live in the house. All that are entitled to be enumerated in Auburn, and who would not be enumerated elsewhere should be carefully placed on the list. Every person in Indiana between the ages named, should be on some list, in order that the public money may be fairly and fully distributed to each school corporation. Mrs. Rakestraw has already won good opinions by her careful canvass, and we look to see as good a list of enumeration as the town ever had. The work of doing this fell to Mr. Rakestraw himself, as a member of the school board, but of course it would greatly inconvience him in his duties at the Kiblinger factory, where he has the work of a sort of general overseer. So he turned it over to his wife. The DAILY congratulates her on being the first lady officer of the county.

New Firm.

Perry Long and Ora Brandon have bought out the business and leased the establishment of John H. Weaver the contractor and builder. These two enterprising mechanics have been with Mr. Weaver several years and are fully competent to take up the business and carry it on. They will be ready at any time to do any work in the carpentry and building and contracts for all such work. Any parties who contemplate building or repairing would do well to give them a call. They are known to be thoroughly reliable and prompt in their dealings.

Drowned In St. Joe.

St. Joe News.

A Sad drowning affair happened two miles below Spencerville on Monday of this week. It seems that Ed Billman, who lives over east in Springfield township, in company with a couple of smaller boys, came to the river to fish. It was about noon, and the boys were sitting along the bank fishing, when young Billman, who was subject to fits, had one of his spells and rolled into the river. The other boys being quite small and badly frightened, were unable to render any assistance, and the young man finally sank to rise no more. The boys went four miles home to tell their friends about it, and notwithstanding the fact that Bert Davis was plowing in a field near by, the boys did not call for help or tell anyone until they got home. Three hours afterward the neighborhood was aroused, boats were secured, and after dragging the river for a few minutes the body was recovered. The young man was about eighteen years of age.

Spring Story.

The first "story" of the spring is on its rounds. The Angola Republican of April 15, has this:

A queer incident occured at Adrian, Michigan, the other day. Paul Sartor, blind in one eye, fell out of a cart and struck the blind optic on a stone pavement. Although the blind eye looked like St. Patrick's day in the evening, and took to the "wearing of green" for a few days, when the bandage was removed, Mr. Sartor discovered that he could see the stone pavement with both eyes. He says if the "looker" goes back on him again, he will be tempted to repeat the fall.

Hotel Yelhsa.

That is the name of the new hotel at Ashley, and a queer name it is, too. It reminds one of what might be expected of a "Kentucky Cu'nel." It is said that when these southern colonels get pretty full of "Old Bourbon," they get out and "yell sah." Ashley's new hotel is to be christened on Thursday evening, April 23, by a big banquet. The "Owl Club" also give a reception in their rooms in the same building. The menu set forth in the bill of fare is a fine one. There will be music and toasts. Tickets $2 each.

Coiled Hoops

The factory of Liniger & Co. at the Junction Booming.

This forenoon a COURIER reporter made a business trip to the Junction and while there through the courtesy of Chas Rafter, the genial Lake Shore agent, we were shown through the Liniger & Co. hoop factory. This company is composed of Mr. Liniger, Chas. Rafter and Harry Culbertson. Under their management they have succeeded in adding a hustling business enterprise to the Junction. A few more such men, and the factories at that point will be numerous. There is no better location for any manufacturing institution. They can ship their product over the three great trunk lines with but little cost for drayage.

This factory was located at the Junction less than a year ago and now sixteen men are employed and they all receive good wages. Some are paid as high a $2.00 a day. It is surprising how little time it takes to work the elm logs up into coils of hoops. Men who operate the machinery are all acquainted with the work and especially is this true of the man who runs the coiling machine. Here ten hoops are rolled up so quick that you can hardly count them. A nail is driven into the last one and it is then dropped into a trough and rolls out into the yard were a man is kept busy piling them up.

The men employed are mostly all from the Junction and it shows good business management in giving the citizens of their own town employment. Keep your eye on the Junction. She will probably locate more factories in the future.

Strong Wheels.

Chicago Record.

A freight car weighing 30,000 pounds will sustain a weight of 60,000 pounds, and drawn by a forty-ton locomotive, will travel over smooth rails at the average rate of twenty miles an hour. A two-horse farm wagon weighing 1,200 pounds will carry 2,500 pounds ove good roads, drawn by horses weighing 2,200 pounds in the aggregate and moving at the average rate of five miles an hour. But a 24-ppund bicycle will carry a man weighing 175 pounds or more, and over a county road, with a minimum of effort, will move at the rate of ten miles an hour.

These figures are indicative of a new era in locomotion and serve to emphasize the wonderful results achieved by the pneumatic tire. A freight car carries twice its weight twenty miles in an hour; the bicycle carries seven times its weight ten miles in an hour. It is probably that, with weight, power and speed considered, nothing has ever been invented which presents such results in carrying and locomotive capacity as are shown by the bicycle. It is only the question as to whether the principle has reached its greatest perfection in the bicycle which suggests a limit to the accomplishments of the pneumatic tire and the ball-bearings. The minimum of weight and the minimum of friction seem to have been attained. Are these applicable to other than the tandem wheels which now are so universally necessary to both business and pleasure?

As compared with the ordinary wagon and with the ordinary railroad car, the bicycle seems to present just now a most interesting suggestion to the constructors of vehicles of whatsoever character.

Common School Diplomas.

There were 188 applicants in the March examination for the state Common School Diplomas. The results of the examination have just been reported by Superintendent Merica, and being a matter that all should be interested in, it may be well to give a little explanation of the plans and purposes of this part of the great school work of the county and state.

In June 1883 the convention of County Superintendents inaugurated the system of Common School Graduation, the issuing of Common School Diplomas. There are prepared and sent out by the state department of education, sets of questions for pupils completing the "eight common branches." Pupils who have "sustained a correct deportment," attained a general average in examinations of 75 per cent, do not fall below 60 per cent in any branch, and perform the work assigned them at the "commencement" are entitled to a diploma. The results of the exercises and diplomas have been "to inspire the pupils graduated with a desire for the higher work, to encourage pupils in the lower grades to complete the course and to create a better sentiment in the community." Besides the honorary value of the diplomas they have permitted their possessors to enter any of our high schools without further examination.

The state Superintendent sustained by a circuit court decision holds that pupils completing the common school course are entitled to free tuition in the higher branches of study and that township trustees who have not made provision for the higher instruction by "township graded schools" should pay the tuition of such pupils who attend the high schools.

There seems too, to be a mistaken idea with some that the common school diploma is equivalent to a teacher's license. This is not the case. Even the high school diploma, or a diploma from our best colleges is not equivalent to such license. The average common school graduates should have three years additional professional training before taking the examination for teacher's license. They must have the special professional training and culture of the eight common branches besides psychology, pedagogy, literature and other work necessary to be able to take the teacher's examination School teaching in Indiana is taking rank among the other learned professions and is requiring a training of no little importance.

With A Revolver.

The Son of John and Dr. Lydia Leasure of Angola Wounded.

ANGOLA, IND., April 20, 1896, (SPECIAL.)—Sunday morning, Kenton, the 5-year-old son of John and Dr. Lyda Leasure, of south Wayne street found his father's 38-caliber revolver in a dresser drawer, walked directly to the front door of his mother's office, took the weapon in his left hand and fired at a house diagonally across on the opposite side of the street. The lad's hand was too weak to hold the gun firm, and when he fired the thing "kicked up," the sharp-pointed sight on the end of the barrel struck him a terrible blow on the left side of the jaw, causing an incision in the flesh and letting the blood flow freely. In some manner the hammer of the gun cut and bruised the ball of the left thumb to such an extent as to cause much pain. Mrs. Leasure was in the library at the time, and upon hearing the report of the gun and screams of her child, her fright was extremely great, and rushing into the office, she happily found her boy was not killed, but wounded, and nearly scared to death. Luckily no one was on the walk or in the street in range of the leaden missile. Kent will perhaps never forget his first military exercise preparatory to fighting Spain.

CASTORIA

Castoria is Dr. Samuel Pitcher's prescription for Infants and Children. It contains neither Opium, Morphine nor other Narcotic substance. It is a harmless substitute for Paregoric, Drops, Soothing Syrups, and Castor Oil. It is Pleasant. Its guarantee is thirty years' use by Millions of Mothers. Castoria destroys Worms and allays feverishness. Castoria prevents vomiting Sour Curd, cures Diarrhœa and Wind Colic. Castoria relieves teething troubles, cures constipation and flatulency. Castoria assimilates the food, regulates the stomach and bowels, giving healthy and natural sleep. Castoria is the Children's Panacea—the Mother's Friend.

Castoria.

"Castoria is an excellent medicine for children. Mothers have repeatedly told me of its good effect upon their children."

DR. G. C. OSGOOD, Lowell, Mass.

"Castoria is the best remedy for children of which I am acquainted. I hope the day is not far distant when mothers will consider the real interest of their children, and use Castoria instead of the various quack nostrums which are destroying their loved ones, by forcing opium, morphine, soothing syrup and other hurtful agents down their throats, thereby sending them to premature graves."

DR. J. F. KINCHELOE, Conway, Ark.

Castoria.

"Castoria is so well adapted to children that I recommend it as superior to any prescription known to me."

H. A. ARCHER, M. D., 111 So. Oxford St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

"Our physicians in the children's department have spoken highly of their experience in their outside practice with Castoria, and although we only have among our medical supplies what is known as regular products, yet we are free to confess that the merits of Castoria has won us to look with favor upon it."

THE NEWS RECORD.

SUMMARY OF A WEEK'S HAPPENINGS.

The Latest News as Flashed Over the Wires from All Parts of the World—Regarding Politics, Religion, Casualties, Commerce, and Industry.

Cleveland Will Royally Entertain the Knights of Pythias.

What promises to be the greatest Knights of Pythias demonstration in the history of the order will be held in Cleveland from August 24 to 31 inclusive. This is the year of Cleveland's centennial anniversary celebration and the Centennial Commissioners have just decided to contribute liberally toward paying the encampment expenses. It is estimated that more than 75,000 Pythians and their friends will be in the city during the encampment, which will include about 15,000 members of the uniform rank, who will camp on the immense field, acres in extent, and less than a mile from the heart of the city, and owned by ex-Senator R Payne.

Seven Men Slain.

Butte (Mont.) special: The Broadwater mine at Nethart was the scene of a terrible explosion, resulting in the death of seven miners and the serious injury of six others, some of whom cannot recover.

The dead are: Frank Doran, Jimmy Morrison, Hugh McKenzie, Dan O'Leary, Dan Ross, John Kerns, Joe Dearborn.

The wounded are: Mike Ward, James Comity, Mike Coburn, Charles Schmidt, James Gallagher, Joe Doran.

Of the men killed all were single except Frank Doran. At last accounts James Gallagher was dying. It is also feared that three others will die.

Mammoth Crack in a Mountain.

Johnson City (Tenn.) special: An immense fissure in the earth has made its appearance on the top of Iron Mountain, between North Carolina and Tennessee, on the Bakersville Road. This opening is six to twelve feet wide, and runs on the summit for the entire length of the mountain, which is several miles. It is supposed to have been caused by the recent heavy rains which fell there, the earth becoming so saturated that it gave way, causing this mammoth crack.

Adventure with a Bear.

While Mr. and Mrs. H. Gregorson of Fooston, Minn., were away from home a bear invaded the house and carried off their infant daughter. Her 8-year-old brother was in a barn near by, and, hearing the little one's scream, ran out in time to see the bear trotting away with his little sister. He ran into the house, got his father's gun, wheh he was barely able to lift, and killed the bear with three shots The child was unharmed.

Rev. Rondthaler to Leave Indianapolis.

Rev. J. A. Rondthaler, pastor of the Tabernacle Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, called a congregational meeting and presented a letter of resignation. After some debate it was reluctantly accepted. It is understood that he will go to Chicago, where he will assume the pastorate of the Fullerton Avenue Presbyterian Church.

River Front Swept by Fire.

The river front of Evansville, Ind., was swept by fire the other day. Three wharfboats and two steamers—the Alexander Perry, a Cumberland river packet, and the A. L. Norton, a Green river packet—burned to the water's edge and sank. The wharf-boats were packed with freight, which is an entire loss. The total damage will reach $100,000; partially insured. No lives were lost.

Allison's Manager Talks.

H. G. McMillen, Chairman of the Iowa Republican State Central Committee, who has been in charge of Senator Allison's Iowa campaign, says: "It is plain to all that there will be no nomination on one of the early ballots, and when it comes to a protracted balloting Allison is sure to grow, because he is a man who is safe and on whom all factions can unite."

The Plunger, Ed Pardridge Dead.

Ed Pardridge, the wheat speculator, of Chicago, who has been ill for several weeks with Bright's disease, is dead. Mr. Pardridge first came into prominence on the Board of Trade as a bear in the wheat market about ten years ago, and is reputed to have made and lost several fortunes since that time. He left a fortune of at least $1,000,000.

Struck by Lightning.

Christ Union Church, at Hellerstown, near Bethlehem, Pa., was struck by lightning and burned to the ground. Loss $12,000; insurance, $9,000.

Masonic Temple Theater, Ft. Wayne, Indiana.

April 29.—"Shore Acres."
May 4.—Thomas W. Keene.

Brakeman Killed.

A. L. Galloway of Vanceburg, Ky., was killed while coupling cars at Guyandotte, W. Va.

Forest on Fire.

The immense tract of timber land owned by Hon. William J. Flagg, of New York City, situated immediately north of Buena Vista, Ohio, is on fire, and much valuable timber is being destroyed. Lines of fire miles long can be seen at night. Men are fighting the fire.

Ohio Preacher's Fate.

Rev. John R. Griswold, age 70, was burned to death at New Haven, Conn. He was putting out a fire in the woods. He was found by his daughter, Annie, dead. His last pastorate was in Ohio.

Saved Her Honor.

A special from New Castle, Pa., says: An unknown Italian stopped at the home of Mrs. Martha Burt, near Bessemer, and finding no men about, attempted to assault her. Mrs. Burt ran into another room followed by the Italian. As he entered she seized a revolver and shot him dead. The ball took effect near the heart.

Detained American Citizens.

Havana special: The police have detained a Protestant Bishop, Alberto Jesus Diaz, who had received a call, and his brother, Alfredo Victoriano Diaz. These two gentlemen are naturalized Americans. The police report that they found in their possession certain insurgent documents.

CONSERVATIVE.

No Disposition on the Part of Business Men to Indulge in Speculation.

R. G. Dun & Co.'s Weekly Review of Trade says: The sudden change from sleighing to midsummer tested the prevalent idea that good weather only is needed to bring a great improvement in business. Everywhere there has been more real buying, and in some branches a better demand at wholesale and at the works resulted, but not as yet in most lines. There is no abatement of the almost universal disposition to deal with unusual conservatism and not to anticipate the future. This has been especially conspicuous where combinations have been formed or prices advanced. The comparative infrequency of serious failures, with money less disturbed since gold exports began than might have been expected, helps to give encouragement, but does not kindle the speculative fires, so that such improvement as appears is mainly of a healthy sort. To many interested in coke, steel billets, Bessemer pig and various forms of steel, it may be disappointing that forming combinations and fixing prices has not started again the rush to buy ahead of needs, which made last year so memorable. Wheat rose 5 cents last week but met some reaction. It is a shade higher than a week ago. Later accounts are more promising as to winter wheat. Heavy commercial and mill stocks hinder most buyers, and possibilities of injury to the coming crop, retard sellers at current prices.

A School Building Wrecked By Dynamite.

Saginaw (Mich.) special: The Central school building, on the west side, was wrecked by dynamiters early the other morning. It was the oldest and largest of the big schools on that side of the river, and for years has been a bone of contention. At 2 o'clock a terrific explosion occurred, which wrecked the building, and which was followed by fire. A portion of the library was also destroyed. The building contained twenty-seven rooms and had a capacity of 800 pupils. The loss is $40,000, with $27,000 insurance. A vigorous effort will be made to unearth the dynamiters. J. W. Burnham, who was watching the fire, was run down by a bicycle and probably fatally injured.

New Grand Circuit.

Detroit (Mich.) special: Representatives of the trotting associations of Detroit, Cleveland, Columbus, Saginaw, Fort Wayne, Indianapolis, and Buffalo met here to form a new grand circuit for 1896 and decide upon the dates of meeting, classes, etc. Columbus, Fort Wayne, and Indianapolis are new members, succeeding eastern cities, which have quit on account of rigid anti-pool selling laws. The Buffalo association is as yet undecided, the result being dependent upon the passage by the New York Senate of the pool law which has already passed the Assembly. It is assured that upwards of $225,000 will be offered in prizes on the circuit.

Prisoner Shot Dead.

Jackson (Mich.) special: Thomas Brown, serving a seven year sentence in the State Prison for burglary, was shot and instantly killed while attempting to escape. He and Pat Dolan made a rush from the Withington & Cooley shop with a ladder, which they placed against the wall. Dolan was on top when a guard halted him. He jumped back, but Brown kept on and was shot through the heart. Other convicts attempted to join Brown and Dolan when they left the shop, but were prevented by the prompt action of the guards.

Spaniards Defeated.

Havana special: News has been receive here of a battle near Lechuza between the Alphonse XIII battalion, under command of Col. Debos, and the insurgents under Maceo. The Spanish troops fought with great desperation against heavy odds, but were defeated with losses of many killed and wounded. Divining the intention of the enemy to encircle his column, Col Debos ordered a retreat.

Tarred and Feathered an Offender.

At Damascus, a Quaker village near Alliance, Ohio, a mob of masked men called William Irey from the home of Mrs. George Enlett, with whom he had been living, and tarred and feathered him. They turned him loose and threatened to hang him if he did not leave the village.

Ordered to Arrest Filibusterers.

Warrants have been issued from the United States District Attorney's office in Philadelphia for the arrest of John D. Hart, owner of the steamer Bermuda, and the ship's officers, on charges of filibustering. Dr. Congosta, the Spanish Consul, is the prosecutor.

Burned to Death.

Bertha Dakin, aged 7, and Alice Woodin, ag d 9, grandchildren of Nelson Bishop, with whom they lived, were burned to death in their bed at Falls Village, Conn. Mr. Bishop managed to escape after being seriously burned.

Italians Fight and Kill.

A free fight among four Italians at a pier near Hamilton Ferry, Brooklyn, resulted in two men being stabbed and one shot in the heart.

Two Men Killed.

Michael and Andrew Alinsink, brothers, were killed in the mines of the Kettle Creek Coal company, at Bitumine, Pa., by a fall of coal.

BIG ROW AT THE END.

SECRETARY CARLISLE SPEAKS IN CHICAGO.

Free-Silver Advocates Create a Scene at the Meeting—They Fire a Volley of Questions at the Speaker—Police Take a Hand in Affairs.

Carlisle at Chicago.

Secretary of the Treasury John G. Carlisle addressed an audience in the Chicago Auditorium for nearly two hours Wednesday night on the financial question.

Gold was down on the program, and had the platform. Silver was down on gold and had the fun. Altogether, says a correspondent, the address of the gold advocate was as near a Harvey-Horr debate as the friends of the white metal could make it. And it only wanted a little more warm blood and a little less police to end in a row.

Mr. Carlisle had held his long and august form in the vision of the people for two hours when the silver men began. Then the lights went out and that ended the incipient debate. They began this way. Mr. Carlisle had just thanked the people for listening to him. Col. J. C. Roberts, a prominent member of the People's party and one of the editors of the National Bimetallist, who had stumped the South for Mr. Carlisle in the days when the Secretary talked not of gold but of silver, arose in his seat, and, in a voice that was heard above the din of cheering and other noises, demanded the attention of the chairman, M. J. Carroll, who had called upon Secretary Grady to read a resolution thanking Mr. Carlisle for having accepted the invitation of trade unionists to address them.

"I desire to ask Mr. Carlisle," said Col. Roberts, "to answer one question."

"Sh-h-h-h-h," said the people, and Mr. Carlisle did not turn his retreating form.

M. J. Carroll, who had not called for short words of testimony in closing, jumped up with the resolutions in his hand.

"Whereas——" he began.

"Why don't you let the speaker answer the question," shouted another man, rising in an excited little group.

"Whereas——"

"Mr. Chairman, why don't you——"

The "whereas" seemed to have it and the resolution, which advised all the workingmen to read Mr. Carlisle's speech and voted him unlimited thanks, was read, although for the rising din it might as well have been Weyler's proclamation. The groups of silver men, who were intent upon asking the question, were noisy and belligerent. But two policemen had Col. Roberts in their eyes, and found him and conducted the Populist to the rear.

Chairman Carroll finally managed to put the resolution of thanks to a vote. There were thunderous "yeas," but the "noes" would have carried any ordinary caucus. Little whirlpools of turmoil were forming in different parts of the house, and the policemen were kept busy. The crowd, too, was moving homeward.

"Hurrah for Eugene V. Debs, anyway," yelled a silver man.

This called forth a vigorous response.

"Hurrah for John G. Carlisle," shouted a gold man in the gallery. The "house" was plainly "gold."

By this time the police had circulated their rotund forms quite thoroughly and the belligerents were quieted.

The question which they wanted to ask, and for which Col. Roberts rose, related to Carlisle's speech in 1878, when he pronounced the demonetization of silver "the most gigantic crime of this or any other age," which would "ultimately entail more misery upon the human race than all the wars, pestilence and famine that ever occurred in the history of the world."

The silverites had fun earlier in the evening by distributing the following tribute to Mr. Carlisle, until the police stopped them:

"John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, after a lifetime devoted to the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, was suddenly converted in 1893 to the gold standard in order to secure a seat in Cleveland's cabinet.

"He now comes here, fresh from the banquet tables of the Wall street gold bugs, to tell the idle and starving workingmen of Chicago how they may be successfully robbed by the gold bugs for the next four years."

CLEVELAND AND CUBA.

President Complies with the Request Made by the Senate.

The President has transmitted to Congress without comment the correspondence called for by the Senate at the instance of Senator Hoar relative to the attempt at mediation made by the United States Government during the course of the preceding rebellion in Cuba. The correspondence covers the period from November 5, 1875, to August, 1876, and comprises about 400 typewritten pages. A great part of it has already been made public, some of it in Wharton's digest of international law and some in correspondence formerly supplied to Congress.

The leading feature is the letter of Secretary Fish to United States Minister Caleb Cushing at Madrid in 1875 setting out at great length the evils of the situation as it then existed in Cuba and suggesting reforms that the Spanish Government should put into operation in Cuba to correct these abuses.

Copies of this note were submitted to all of the courts of Europe, apparently to pave the way for the intervention that was hinted at in case Spain failed to profit by the suggestions of Mr. Fish, but the concluding chapters of the correspondence show, as is well known now, that the efforts to intervene came to naught and that the recognition of the belligerency of the insurgents was held up by our Government.

RED LAKE RESERVATION.

Grand Rush for Homes to Take Place on May 15.

In an irregular rectangle in northwestern Minnesota, with a length of 112 miles and a breadth of 100, with a frontier of about 500, and containing 900,000 acres ready for settlement, is the great Red Lake reservation, the last of the large northwestern Indian reservations. It is to be opened to the settler on May 15. The entire reserve consists of about 4,000,000 acres, but much of it contains pine and will not be allowed for settlement, while more is to be reserved for the 1,500 Indians of the Red Lake Chippewas, and will not come into the market until the band is wiped out or has become sufficiently civilized to take and improve allotments, and cease to be the ward of the nation.

The reservation is virgin territory, of meadow, oak openings, reclaimable bog, prairie and brush lands, an unbroken wilderness of pine and hardwood forest, of tamarack, cedar and spruce swamp, of muskeg and of lake, brook and river. Save the freighters' roads to and from the trading post at the agency at the south shore of the lake, in the center of the lands, and the marks of the surveyor's ax and scribe on section lines and corners, there are no signs of the intrusion of the white man on this the greatest hunting and fishing ground held for the northwestern Indians. Were it not for the prevalent industrial and financial depression there would be a rush to this promised land as great as was that at the opening of the Oklahoma country, and as it is there is the greatest movement of people that the Northwest has ever seen.

MAP OF THE RESERVATION.

German and Scandinavian farmers are in the majority of incomers. The States of Iowa, Minnesota and Dakota have furnished the largest quota. Southern Michigan, the Dunkard colonies of Indiana, Nebraska, and even the New England States are looked on to be represented later by hundreds of colonists.

The Red Lake lands are beautiful for situation, well watered by streams whose sources are in never-failing springs, while ten to fifteen feet will tap the underground veins in any part of the lands to be opened. There is no danger of drouth. There are no prettier locations for homes in all the West than on the streams that the Red Lake Indians have so zealously guarded for these many years, and are now about to give up. Around the streams and bordering the lakes is the timber growth, which, next to the meadow grass, will yield to the fortunate possessor the most ample returns until the cleared land may produce crops. This timbered growth comprises all the woods common to the North, poplar predominating, and all in a thrifty condition. The timber is interspersed with hazel bushes, an unfailing sign of excellent soil. Several railroads are preparing to cross the lands in the near future, most of them running to the Lake Superior entrepot of Duluth, which will give the finest market in the Northwest to the grain and produce raised. Among these roads is the Farmers' Railroad of the North Dakota agriculturists, under the lead of D. W. Hines.

The opening of this reservation will have widespread results. It will push the frontier into Canada; it will settle the vacant lands in northern Minnesota and make them tributary to the wholesalers of Minneapolis, St. Paul and Duluth; it will double the population of the surrounding towns in a month; it will add 25,000 people to the census of Minnesota in the first year; it will infuse new blood and new life into the farming communities of the Northwest.

Rev. Dr. John Lanahan sprung a sensation in the Methodist preachers' meeting at Baltimore when he announced that in a few days he would publish in a permanent form a document entitled "The Era of Frauds in the Methodist Book Concern at New York," where he was at one time an agent.

A magnificent banquet was given at the City of Mexico by foreign resident manufacturers, merchants and bankers in honor of President Diaz. The station house of the Vera Cruz Railway was converted into a banquet hall and 500 people sat down to the table.

GEN. FITZHUGH LEE.

Something of the Newly Appointed Consul General to Cuba.

Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, the newly appointed consul general to Cuba, is a nephew of Gen. Robert E. Lee and served under the great Confederate leader during the war of the rebellion. He was born in 1835 at Clermont, Fairfax County, Virginia, and was graduated from the military academy in 1856. Commissioned as lieutenant in the Second cavalry, he went to the frontier, was severely wounded by the Indians and was recalled to be instructor of cavalry at West Point. When the war came Lieut. Lee resigned his commission and joined the Confederate cause. At first he did staff duty and was adjutant general of Ewell's brigade. In September, 1861, he was made lieutenant colonel of the First Virginia cavalry and soon afterward was promoted to be colonel. He served in all the campaigns of the army of northern Virginia. In 1862 Lee was made a brigadier general and a major general in 1863. At Winchester, in 1864, he was disabled by a severe wound, which kept him from duty for several months. In 1865 he was placed in command of the whole cavalry corps of the army of northern Virginia, and a month later surrendered to Gen. Meade at Farmville and retired to his Virginia home. In 1865 he was elected Governor of Virginia. Gen. Lee goes to Cuba with absolute liberty to travel about wherever he pleases unobstructed and unrestricted by the Spaniards. Should the President desire any information concerning the state of affairs in Cuba the new consul general will be in a position to gather it. It is known that Gen. Lee, while being a fair man, warmly sympathizes with the insurgents.

FARM WORK PROGRESSING.

Weekly Reports of the Weather Bureau Covering Crop Prospects.

The Weather Bureau, in summing up the situation in weather and crop circles, says that in the Southern States the week has been generally favorable for farm work, which has made good progress. In the more Northern districts, owing to the lateness of the season, farming operations are much delayed, but are being pushed forward as rapidly as possible. Cotton planting is now quite general in the northern portion of the cotton belt, is well advanced in the southern portion, and the early planted is coming up. In Florida, it is nearly finished. Winter wheat is reported in excellent condition in Nebraska and eastern Kansas, and much improved and looking well in Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas, Tennessee and northern Illinois. Less favorable reports are received from Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, West Virginia, Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania and New York, in some of which States it has been winter killed and is in poor condition. No corn has yet been planted north of the Ohio river, but some planting has been done as far north as Kentucky and Virginia. West of the Mississippi some corn has been planted as far north as southern Nebraska. Planting is nearly completed in Oklahoma, and is in progress in Missouri. In Illinois and Indiana plowing for corn is general. In the Southern States corn planting is practically completed.

START A BLAND BOOM.

Missouri Democrats Declare for Free Silver Coinage.

R. P. Bland's boom for the presidential nomination, on a free coinage of silver platform, was launched with great enthusiasm by the Missouri Democratic State convention at Sedalia. It was the largest gathering of the party ever held in the State, for, in addition to the 535 delegates, over 2,000 visitors were present. Chairman Moffitt of the State Central Committee called the convention to order in Wood's Opera House at 12:30 o'clock. After prayer by Rev. J. S. Meyer, ex-Congressman William M. Hatch was announced as temporary chairman, and Jeff Pollard of St. Louis as temporary secretary. Mr. Hatch made a spirited address, and throughout its delivery was cheered long and loud. The mention of Mr. Bland's name as one of the most valuable and faithful of Democrats brought forth a flood of applause and cheers. Mr. Hatch hoped the Chicago convention would adopt an unequivocal silver platform.

DEBS BARRED OUT.

Faculty of Chicago University Refuses to Let Him Address Students.

Division of opinion and not a little feeling has been aroused among the students of the Chicago University by the decision of the faculty in barring E. V. Debs from speaking to the students some time during the next quarter. At a meeting of the local oratorical association it was agreed to invite the labor leader. When the members of the faculty were apprised of the intended invitation they immediately sent out for the representatives of the association and firmly demanded that no such invitation should be issued.

HEAT RECORD BROKEN

AUGUST WEATHER IS EXPERIENCED IN APRIL.

By Beginning Before Sunrise the Thermometer at Chicago Works Itself Up to 88 at 4 o'Clock, and Winter-Garment-Wearing Public Melts.

Oppressive Weather.

Records in the weather line underwent a shock Thursday, from which they cannot recover for at least a year. With a unanimity that was admirable all the thermometers and all the old residents agree that it was the hottest April day that ever fell to their lot.

The thermometer in the Chicago Auditorium tower, which always is bashful about climbing up too high, registered at one time during the afternoon as high as 84, but its metallic brothers in the streets below were not at all backward in proclaiming their knowledge that it was 88. The weather records hold only two cases approaching that of Thursday, and those two days were in 1893 and 1894, respectively. But no proofs written or unwritten could persuade the people that it wasn't hottest day that any April ever produced.

It began long before the sun shot up over Lake Michigan in the early morning. By 8 o'clock the jubilant mercury tube registered 78. From that time on the metal seemed to have things its own way. It shot up with each succeeding hour until at 4 o'clock it registered just 88. At the same time the marking in the Auditorium tower had it 84.

The trouble, as everybody agreed, was that people were afraid to discard woolens, which had been in use during the winter, for lighter underwear. While the temperature went up and up the people kept saying with a fatal persistency, "Well, it'll be cooler to-morrow. It's only April and this can't last." But that brought no relief, and the tired men and women simply kept on perspiring. One man was overcome by the heat.

Chicago was not alone in its torridity. New York just tied the record of 84 degrees, and the official thermometer of St. Louis, which, like Chicago's, is bashful about too high an ascension, registered 88. In Louisville there was a good, hot, baseball temperature of 86, and even frigid Boston mustered up a marking of 76. The hot wave extended over practically the whole Mississippi valley.

CLASH MUST SOON OCCUR.

Bellicose Forces in the Valley of the Nile Drawing Together.

The Emir of Dongola is moving northward with considerable forces. Spies report his having passed Aboo Fatneh, seventy miles south of Sparda, to join the dervishes who are massing at the latter place, which is forty-five miles from the Egyptian outpost at Akasheh.

Sarras and Akasheh have been strongly garrisoned. The railway between these points is being pushed forward as rapidly as possible. Four miles of rail have been already laid, and the track will be completed along the course laid down in 1884, in order to pass the cataracts. For the guarding of the railway, strong posts have been established on the Nile at Semneh, Wady Ambigel, Tangur and Sonki. Each of these posts has been supplied with a contingent to guard the point opposite to it on the line as it is laid, in order to prevent the dervishes from destroying the works. The dervishes at Suarda, who number 3,000, have advanced their posts to Mograkeh, distant fifteen miles from Akasheh, the main body of the dervishes still remaining at Dongola.

EGYPTIAN MOUNTED INFANTRY.

The moral effect of the announcement of the expedition has been excellent in the Soudan and has been of the utmost service to the Italians at Kassala. Newspaper correspondents are at present prevented from going beyond Sarras. The opinion is held at Egyptian headquarters that commissariat difficulties will prevent the dervishes from making any formidable advance north of Suarda.

MICHIGAN PROHIBITIONISTS.

Adopt a Free Silver Platform and Elect National Delegates.

The Michigan Prohibitionists, in session at Lansing, spent Thursday discussing the relative merits of the dominant idea and the broad-gauged platform. The dominant idea men succeeded in capturing a majority of the Committee on Resolutions and secured a majority report making no mention of free silver.

The minority, however, reported a free silver plank and a resolution instructing the delegation to the national convention to work for a free silver plank in the national platform. The minority report was adopted unanimously and the free silver plank by an overwhelming majority. The resolution of instructions was adopted by a close vote.

The delegates-at-large are Henry A. Reynolds of Pontiac, Samuel Dickie of Albion, George R. Malone of Lansing and Rev. John Russell of New Haven.

United Mine Workers.

The national convention of the United Mine Workers of America opened at Columbus, Ohio, with an unusually large attendance, the various districts of Pennsylvania, Indiana, Illinois, West Virginia, Kentucky and Ohio being fully represented. President P. H. Penna presided, and congratulated the delegates upon the fact that the membership and the financial condition of the organization were stronger to-day than at any time in its history, despite the fact that in December last the treasury was so depleted as to warrant the raising of the question whether a convention could be held this year.

Secretary-Treasurer McBryde, in his report, said the coal trade was better prior to 1890, when this association was formed, than it is now. The value of coal on board the cars at the mines for 1890 was $110,420,851, and for 1894 the value was $1,768,350 less than in 1890, although the product was greater by 7,500,390 tons. This condition, so detrimental to both miner and operator, was caused by the system of the survival of the fittest. The two Virginias and their cheap coal had much to do with effecting the changed conditions. Formerly all their coal went to the Atlantic seaboard. To-day there is more West Virginia coal in Chicago than Ohio coal, though the former has to pass through Ohio en route to Chicago.

BRITAIN'S BIG SURPLUS.

Enormous Revenue Receipts—Condition of Working Classes.

In the British House of Commons Thursday the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, made the budget statement. He said that the surplus for 1895 and 1896 was £4,210,000, and he estimated the expenditure for the current year at £100,047,000. He said that this had been a wonderful year, and one of unexampled revenue in spite of the fact that the expenditures had been the largest since the great war. The surplus was the largest ever known, and a larger sum was devoted to the reduction of the national debt than ever known.

The condition of the working classes, he continued, judging from the consumption of tea, tobacco and sugar, had materially improved, and it was a remarkable fact that while the decrease in the exports and imports for the first six months amounted to £7,531,000 the increase for the second half of the year amounted to £28,228,000. Tea, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach further remarks, was driving coffee out of the market and British and Irish spirits were entirely displacing foreign spirits.

The increase in the import of tea was 10,000,000 pounds from India and Ceylon and replacing so much Chinese tea. The increase in the import of tobacco was 108,000 pounds. The increase in the import of tobacco was £108,000 over the estimate, chiefly for cigarettes. The customs authorities calculated, he added, that £1,000,000 yearly was thrown in the gutter, in the shape of the ends of cigarettes and cigars. The imports of wines had increased £1,256,000; light wines were preferred. Beer had increased £617,000, the death duties were £2,881,000 and stamps £1,629,000.

Referring to the estimates for the current year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the expenditures were placed at £100,047,000, and the revenue calculated upon was £101,755,000.

MADE BLIND TO BEG!

Young Children in Chicago Who Are Cruelly Tortured.

The police of Chicago have unearthed a system of child torture which is almost without parallel in the world's history. One morning recently a police officer saw a woman of distressing appearance sitting on the sidewalk. With her were three children, two of them being blind. The eyes of the little ones were inflamed and red. The woman by signs was begging the people who passed to drop pennies in a little box which was in front of her. The women and children were taken to a police station. During the course of the day a stalwart Italian walked in and asked for them. He was Achille Masselli, the husband of the woman and the father of the children. He was at once placed under arrest, for physicians had declared that the eyes of the little ones had been made blind with something like pepper or gunpowder. Both the man and the woman denied that anything had been done to the eyes of the little ones, but declared that they were born blind.

From the investigation which has followed this startling discovery has developed the fact, so the police say, that the practice of blinding the eyes of young children so that they will be more "useful" in begging is regularly carried on in Chicago. The blindness thus caused is not always permanent, but in the case of the two children of Masselli, at least, it is very doubtful if their eyesight will ever be recovered.

CROWDS ATTEND BALL GAMES.

Total Attendance on Opening Day Larger than Last Year.

Nearly 80,000 persons saw the six opening games in the National Baseball League Thursday. This is somewhat larger than the total attendance last year, and is not far from the greatest number ever recorded on an opening day. The figures:

1895.		1896.
New York	18,000	Philadelphia	23,000
Baltimore	12,000	Baltimore	11,200
Cincinnati	11,000	Cincinnati	14,400
Louisville	9,000	Louisville	10,000
St. Louis	12,000	St. Louis	11,000
Boston	15,000	Washington	9,256
Total	77,000	Total	78,856

This will serve to show that great enthusiasm is being shown everywhere over the national game, and seems to testify the predictions of the magnates that 1896 will be a phenomenally good year for baseball.

Chicago defeated Louisville 4 to 2; Brooklyn worsted Baltimore, 6 to 5; St. Louis scored 5 to Cleveland's 2; Washington won from New York, 6 to 3; Boston scored 7, Philadelphia 3; and Pittsburg almost shut out Cincinnati, 9 to 1.

CHAPTER VII.

By noon the next day, nearly every inmate of Avondale Castle became aware of the fact that on the preceding night a terrible scene had been enacted between Mrs. Meason and her granddaughter, and that, as a consequence of this, Lady Constance was seriously ill.

It was from no very ardent wish to stay at Avondale that Mrs. Meason remained; she had simply a desire to arrange matters for Lady Constance—in other words, to compass her engagement to the Duke d'Azzeglio.

Her ardent wish to make the duke her grandson led her to do a questionable deed; she determined to call upon him, and, if possible, put matters right between him and Constance. She found him at home, and was ushered immediately into his presence; he received her courteously, and when she spoke of Lady Constance his face grew grave.

"You will pardon me, madam," said he, "but this is a subject which I must decline to discuss, even with you. The lady has given me her answer. I suppose, as a gentleman, I should accept it, and say no more."

"Lady Constance," pursued Mrs. Meason, "is fully sensible of the honor which you conferred upon her when you offered her your hand; she refused that honor, not from any feeling of aversion toward yourself, but because she believed that she was not at liberty to accept it."

The duke started.

"Not at liberty? he said. "Are, then, her affections engaged? And, if so, why have you kept the matter secret?"

"My dear duke," said Mrs. Meason, "there has been no concealment because there has been nothing to conceal. Lady Constance is not engaged, but she is the soul of honor, and until a short time ago she believed that she was bound by a foolish promise, given half jestingly in childhood. At one time she was thrown much into the society of her cousin, who has now gone to the war. She gave him a foolish promise, which she now regrets, since it can never be fulfilled."

Having once aroused the duke's curiosity and gained his ear, Mrs. Meason continued to talk to him confidentially. When she left she had extracted from him a promise to call personally at Avondale Castle and inquire for Lady Constance. The duke accompanied her to the carriage, and, with a sinister expression upon his face, watched it roll away.

"She hates these Howarths," he said, "and although she does not love me, she wishes to have me for her grandson. It will answer my purpose to fall in with her wishes in this case. Let me see; there was a story about Mrs. Meason and the Howarths. What was it? I must know."

He returned to his room, touched a small hand-bell which stood upon his table, and his Spanish servant answered. The duke spoke rapidly in Spanish. In less than a week from that day he was fully aware of the true story of the life and death of the young Countess of Harrington.

"The old lady is dangerous," he said to himself when he was fully acquainted with the true facts of the case; "but she cannot be dangerous to me. I know her—that is enough."

After her interview with the duke, Mrs. Meason was in a more contented frame of mind. She went without warning of any kind to her granddaughter's room. Lady Constance was alone sitting in an easy chair with her lap full of her cousin's letters.

"Child, child, why are you grieving like this?" said Mrs. Meason, softly; "are these people to blight your life as they blighted the life of my child? Can you not forget this man?"

"No, I cannot," cried the poor girl; "I shall never forget him."

"Then if you cannot forget him, marry him."

The girl threw up her hands in terror.

"I cannot," she said; "not now. Whenever I think of it I see my mother gazing at me with sad, reproachful eyes, and I know if I married Frank she would always gaze at me so; I should never get rest or peace, never. I wish, oh, how I wish you had never spoken! It would have been better, I am sure; then I might have had some happiness. I shall never have it now."

"My darling, it is of you I am thinking. Do not shrink from me; it is cruel. All I have done I have done for your sake; remember that."

When she had gone Constance sat motionless for fully half an hour. Then she went to her writing table, and sat down to write.

"I know now," she wrote, "that I can never become your wife. Try to forget me. It would have been better for us both if we had never met. Do not think that I am writing a hasty decision. I have reflected well, and I pray that we may never meet again. CONSTANCE."

Having written this, she placed it in an envelope and addressed it to Captain Howarth. Then she sat down, kissed the letters which she had in her lap, and placed them one by one in the fire.

CHAPTER VIII.

The summer months had completely passed away; autumn was well advanced, yet the family still lingered at Avondale Castle. The duke was again a constant visitor at Avondale Castle; indeed, his visit was looked for with pleasure by all, including Lady Constance herself.

At first, knowing what had passed, she had shrunk from meeting the duke. After their first interview, however, her uneasiness vanished; the duke was so courteous, so kind.

She said to him one day, "I once did you a wrong—in thought. I ask your pardon. You are very good, I am sure, or you would not be so forgiving, so kind to me."

The duke looked at her. She was sitting in a large armchair near the open window, the moonlight was streaming in, making her pale face still paler.

"If I could make you happy," he said, "I should be content."

"Make me happy?" repeated the girl, "I do not think there is any happiness in this world."

"[illegible] I have heard that you are attached to your cousin."

She did not answer him, but, with a shudder, she covered her eyes with her hand.

"May I ask," pursued the duke, quietly, "if your cousin is a poor man?"

"He is not rich," said Constance.

"You are doubtless aware," said the duke, watching her quietly from between the half-closed lids of his eyes, "that I am rich beyond the desire of any man, and could easily spare half of my wealth, and I will, if by so doing I can secure your happiness."

"I do not understand."

"I mean I will make your cousin a rich man, and then I suppose you would become his wife."

"Become his wife?—no, never. You do not understand, sir, when you talk like that. I and my cousin can never be more than cousins—we can never be man and wife."

"You do not wish to marry him?"

"No, I do not wish it."

The duke was about to reply when the door opened and a servant entered with a letter for Lady Constance. One glance at it and the blood flowed back to her heart. It was from Frank Howarth.

"Will you excuse me?" she said, faintly. The duke bowed, and led her from the room. Constance hurried to her boudoir, tore open the letter and read:

"My Darling Constance—Your letter has driven me mad. In heaven's name, what does it all mean? Not that you do not love me. I will never believe that, but that some evil influence has come between us, and you have listened. I am here helpless, and in danger of losing you. I should ask my father to come to you, but I know he would be turned from the door of Avondale Castle. If I am to lose you, perhaps heaven will be merciful and let the next bullet lay me low; if I escape be sure that I shall come to you, and ask for the fulfillment of your promise. For pity's sake, my Constance, write to me and tell me I have had a horrible dream.

"FRANK."

All that night she scarcely closed her eyes; the next day she went out to walk in Avondale Park. She had not proceeded far when she was startled by a sudden rustling of the bushes. She looked about her; the sound of footsteps fell upon her ear; a figure approached her; it was the Duke d'Azzeglio.

"I was on my way to the Castle," said the duke, taking her hand, "when I saw you coming toward the park, and followed. I have something to say to you, Lady Constance; shall I say it now, or defer it till some future time?"

"As you please."

"Then I will say it now. Last night, after you had retired, I spoke for a while with Mrs. Meason. I told her you were pale and sad, and needed change. She agreed with me; a change to Spain might be beneficial; therefore, I place my house entirely at your disposal. Only say yes, and I will bid my servants prepare as if for the reception of a queen."

He spoke eagerly and quickly, and fixed his dark eyes upon her with a strange piercing glance. The girl shook her head.

"You are good," she said, "but I would rather remain at Avondale."

"For why—to be tortured daily, hourly, by sights and memories which wring your heart and make your young life purgatory? You were not born to waste your life in solitude; you were made to rule as surely as a star in heaven is made to shine."

"Pray do not speak so if we are to remain friends."

"My child," he said, "what you offer me is not friendship. The office of a friend is a sacred one, and means much. A friend should console and help; you refuse to let me do either."

"Because I cannot. There are certain things which even a friend cannot understand, and sorrows which cannot be shared. You offer to be my friend. I will accept your offer, if you will not demand a confidence I cannot give."

"I accept the condition," replied the duke. "And now, Lady Constance, may I walk with you back to the Castle?"

She bowed, and they passed on, keeping to the avenue of beech trees.

Scarcely had they gone a hundred yards when a man emerged from the shadow of the trees and stood fixing his eyes upon the retreating figure of the duke.

The stranger was a middle-aged man, evidently a gentleman, though his clothes were ragged and travel-stained; and when he moved he limped, as if his feet were blistered with the worn out shoes he wore.

"So," he said, "I have found my gentleman at last! May imprudence dance attendance on revenge, and to aid my purpose! I have waited patiently for years. I have crossed the world in pursuit of him; I have followed him from land to land, and now we are to meet! Keep calm, Feveral, keep calm. Let me see, what am I? An artist, and for the present, at least, I must follow my vocation. To begin with, I think I will sketch the Ranger's Lodge—make a few inquiries, then wait for a chance to send me—the Duke d'Azzeglio."

CHAPTER IX.

Mr. Feveral, as he styled himself, continued to walk in a desultory limping fashion toward the Ranger's Lodge, a pretty little building set on the borders of Avondale Park. He paused before it; then he felt in his coat pocket, produced a pencil and drawing book, and began to sketch the lodge. As he had anticipated, an out-at-elbows artist soon attracted attention, the door of the lodge opened and the ranger appeared.

The ranger was an old man, very short and very wizened, but with a keen eye and plenty of shrewd sense. Seeing a stranger at his door, he came out to address him. The stranger puzzled him. He wore the dress of a beggar, yet his occupation was that of a gentleman.

"Good morning, my friend," said Feveral, lightly. "I am in want of some information which I hope you may be able and willing to give me."

"Oh, you are, are you? Well, if you want information, you'd best seek it in the village. I ain't a spy or an informer."

"Precisely; I never suspected you of being either. I did, however, suspect you of being [illegible] of so very charming a lady as Lady Constance."

"Lady Constance! what may you know about her?"

"Very little, I must confess. I have merely seen her once, when she was walking in the park with a friend of mine—the Duke d'Azzeglio."

The old man started, and stared stupidly at his companion.

"The Spanish duke a friend o' thine?"

"Certainly," replied Feveral, "though I must confess we have not met for years. Now tell me, my friend, is the duke a resident here?"

"No, he be only a visitor."

"His grace is a friend of Lady Constance?"

"Ay, something of that sort," replied Jacob, with a peculiar smile. "They do say he be going to marry her."

"Ah!"

The stranger's face, hitherto so pleasant and smiling, grew suddenly grave. The sketch of the lodge being finished, Feveral handed it to the ranger, who was highly pleased.

"If you will grant me permission to walk in the park now and again and make a few sketches from nature, I shall be obliged," and, with a pleasant "Good-day," he limped off to gather fresh information in the village.

Late that same night Lady Constance and her grandmother were alone in the dining room at Avondale Castle.

"Constance," said the old lady, "why are you so stubborn in this matter? The duke is a man of high family, and of enormous wealth. Were you his wife I could die in peace."

"Ah! do not talk of dying," cried the girl; "you are the only one left me now. What is wealth to me? would it bring me happiness?"

"If you have any love for your mother's memory avenge her. Marry the duke, and take your place in society by his side."

The girl shuddered and covered her face.

"You ask too much," she said. "Ah! grandma!" she cried suddenly, "what is that? I saw a man. He was standing near the window, looking at us. I will search; he must be there still."

She rushed out and looked about her. She could see no one, and all was still as death. Trembling very much, she re-entered the room, closed the window and drew the curtains.

On reaching her room a slight sound attracted her attention; she turned quickly and saw a small white packet on the floor. Wondering very much, she lifted it. It was a letter with a stone attached to it, and had evidently been thrown in at the window. She opened the letter and read these words, which had been hurriedly scrawled in pencil:

"If you are what you seem, do not marry the Duke d'Azzeglio."

CARE OF THE INVALID.

How to Make Life in the Sick-Room as Bright as Possible.

Give the room which has the best means of ventilation and the most sunshine to the invalid.

Have dark green Holland shades at the windows. Green tempers the glare of the sun in a way very soothing to tired eyes.

Have a big screen in the room which may be used either to shut out the bright light when the patient wishes to sleep or to keep off draughts when the windows are raised and lowered.

Change the bed linen as often as possible. Once a day is not too often. In making the bed be sure that the under sheet is stretched as tight and smooth as a drum cover. Wrinkles in the under sheet cause continual discomfort and sometimes sores.

Banish creaking chairs from the sick-room. Nothing so grates upon the patient's nerves and so irritates him as unnecessary harsh sounds. Don't whisper outside his door. That is intensely aggravating to him, and conversations with the doctor may be just as well carried on outside the invalid's hearing.

Keep the medicine bottles, glasses and spoons out of sight of the patient. Every sick-room should be provided with a small bottle cabinet where medicine may be kept. If this is out of the question a couple of swinging shelves curtained in silk may be used.

Do not ask the patient what he wants to eat. Ask the doctor what he should eat, prepare it daintily and in small quantities, and serve it to him, arrayed as temptingly as possible. Cover the tray with a spotless linen cloth, use the prettiest china and the brightest silver and glass, and adorn the tray with a flower or two. Daintiness is a great appetizer.

Follow the physician's instructions religiously about the number of visitors to be allowed in the sick-room. Keep out doleful and reminiscent persons, who can always remember a similar case which ended fatally. Allow only cheerful, sunny visitors in; repeat only cheerful gossip, and never allow the conversation to be either exciting or depressing.

A Weather Prophet.

"Are we going to have a pleasant afternoon for our picnic, Uncle Asa?" inquired one of the youthful residents of Boxtown, addressing its oldest inhabitant. The speaker's tone was full of anxiety, and venerable Uncle Asa took up the argument as if he appreciated its overwhelming importance. "Well, I dunno," he said, slowly. "When it comes to weather, folks hev got to use their jedgment, that's what I tell 'em.

"There's signs, o' course," the prophet continued, "that's some help. 'Taint so liable to stay faired off when the wind has backed round through the north as 'tis when she's hauled round through the south inter the west."

"The wind went round through the south, for I watched the clouds," said the prospective picnicker, eagerly.

"I said 'twant so liable," continued Uncle Asa, "but there ain't no suttinty about it. I've knowed the wust storms to come up arter a hauled wind. An' there's the moon—some folks set a sight by the moon, an' her quarterin' and fullin', but sakes alive, I don't! An' there's others that say, 'Rain before seven, shine before 'leven,' but that ain't wuth reckonin' on, I can tell ye.

"Then there's 'mack'rel sky' an' 'mares' tails.' I don't put no manner o' trust in them; nothin' but clouds, an' liable to mean somethin' or nothin', jest accordin'. A clear sky is jest as often follered by a weather-spell as any other kind."

"Well, then, I don't see as you can tell at all," said the dejected inquirer.

"You've got to use your jedgment, that's what you've got to do," responded Uncle Asa.

"What do you call judgment?" asked the picnicker.

"Take your umbrella, or else stay to home," returned Uncle Asa, firmly. "[illegible] what I call jedgment when SPANISH CRUELTY.

AWFUL TREATMENT OF AMERICANS IN CUBA IN 1873.

The Bloodthirsty Slaughter of the Virginius Prisoners—Cavalry Riding Over the Bodies of the Dead and Dying to Complete the Execution.

Page of Cuban History.

The "Virginius massacre" was one of the most atrocious of the many Spanish outrages in Cuba during the last insurrection. From the New York Times the following detailed account of the bloodthirsty execution of the prisoners is taken:

Late in 1870 the Cuban revolutionary party purchased in New York a Clyde-built iron side-wheel steamer, called the Virgin, and, rechristening her Virginius, fitted her up as a cruiser and transport for landing men and supplies on the Island of Cuba, and in the following year she sailed under orders from Gen. Raphael Quesada, the revolutionary chief. She succeeded on this occasion in landing a force near Santiago de Cuba, and rendered similar services some time later. In the fall of 1873 an expedition on still larger scale was planned by the Revolutionary Committee, and on October 8 of that year 175 volunteers and a full complement of able seamen, the majority native Americans, left New York to embark on the Virginius, then lying in the harbor of Kingston, Jamaica. The ship was commanded by Capt. Joseph Fry, of Louisiana, who had distinguished himself as a blockade runner during the civil war; and among the revolutionary leaders who boarded her at Kingston were Gen. W. A. C. Ryan, a native New-Yorker, who had already fought in Cuba; Pedro Cespedes, a younger brother of Carlos Manuel Cespedes, President of the Cuban republic, and Gens. Jesus del Sol and Varona, prominent patriots.

CAPT. FRY BIDDING HIS COMRADES FAREWELL BEFORE THEIR DEATH

GEN. JUAN NEPOMUCENO BURRIEL.
(Author of the "Virginius" butchery)

It was on the 24th day of October, 1873, that the Virginius steamed out of Kingston harbor. The original intention was to sail direct for Cuba, but a mishap to the machinery necessitated a stoppage at Port au Prince, Haiti. A second start was made on Oct. 30. Meantime the Spanish consul at Kingston had been keeping a watch on the movements of the cruiser. This resulted in Gov. Burriel, of Santiago de Cuba, ordering the commander of the warship Tornado to sail in quest of her. On the morning of the 31st the Spanish vessel sighted the filibuster on the high sea. The warship headed for the Virginius under full steam. The filibusters realized their danger, and started to make a run for the Jamaica coast.

By a strange lack of foresight on the part of her commander, the Virginius had run short of coal; but, as it was an issue of life or death, no exertion was spared to reach the protection of the British waters. To supply the lack of fuel all the greasy substances on board, such as oil, fat, and hams, from the provision stores, were thrown into the furnaces; all the weapons, the horses, and the cargo were consigned to the waves. But all to no avail. Even the coming on of night proved of little benefit to the fugitives, for the moon rose in full tropical splendor. Finally, toward 10 in the evening, a shell was sent across the bows of the ill-fated cruiser. There was now no alternative; surrender was unavoidable. Presently two armed boats from the Tornado came alongside, and taking possession of the Virginius, made all on board prisoners.

The first order of the Spanish officer in command was to haul down the American flag and hoist in its place the Spanish ensign, notwithstanding the fact that Capt. Fry presented his papers, demonstrating that the Virginius had been duly cleared for colors; and shortly after midnight the two vessels started for Santiago de Cuba, which was reached the following afternoon at 5 o'clock. The arrival of the Tornado with her prize created a tremendous sensation, and the wharves were soon crowded with exultant citizens and officials eager to gaze on the foolhardy "Yankees."

Whatever dismal foreboding the actual leaders of the Virginius expedition may have entertained, it does not appear that the purely American portion of the crew looked forward with any serious apprehension to the outcome of their enterprise. While it is true that the Spanish authorities had good reason to suspect hostile intentions on their part, not a scintilla of evidence had been obtained which would warrant prosecution; for, as already stated, every object of a suspicious nature had been thrown overboard before the surrender, and when the Spaniards boarded the Virginius she was to all outward appearances a peaceable merchantman, duly documented, with the American flag flying at her stern. Capt. Fry and his men, therefore, expected at the worst a short imprisonment and an early return to the United States. But the poor fellows had not reckoned on the bloodthirsty temper of Gov. Burriel and the Spanish volunteers and their intense hatred for this country.

On the day following the arrival of the Virginius in Santiago, a court-martial was held on board the Tornado. It began at 9 and ended at 4 o'clock. The charge was "piracy on the high seas;" and four leaders, Ryan, Varona, Cespedes and Del Sol, were promptly found guilty and sentenced to be shot. Early at dawn on the morning of Nov. 3 the unfortunate men were led from their prison to the slaughter house outside of the town limits, and to the cry of "Cuba forever," they fell beneath a hail of bullets. But this was only a foretaste of Spanish vengeance. The first four victims, though executed in violation of all international law, were at least open and recognized enemies of Spain, and had figured prominently in the war. Not so the captain and the crew of the Virginius, many of whom had even been ignorant of the purposes and destination of the ill-fated vessel. These men appeared before their judges a few hours after the distant rattle of musketry had told them of the fate of their companions, and before dusk the captain and his men—many of them youths under age—had learned that their last moments were at hand. Thirty-seven of them, including Capt. Fry, were told off for execution the next day. The scene of this horrible tragedy was the same as that of the first—the city slaughter-house, an adobe structure with a steep tiled roof, encircled by a shallow trench half filled with stagnant water.

Half a mile separated the jail from the place, and the wretched procession had to march thither on foot, preceded by a corps of drummers with muffled drums. Arrived at the place of doom, the procession halted and formed a hollow square, with the victims in the midst. The line of marines against the slaughter house next opened, and the prisoners were placed kneeling on the edge of the trench, bound but not blindfolded, their faces turned to the wall. What followed is best told in the words of Franklin Coffin, an American eye witness of the tragedy:

CAVALRY TRAMPLING TO DEATH WOUNDED VIRGINIUS PRISONERS.

"After they had knelt down," he says, "the captain walked along the line and bade each one good-by separately. No one was slighted, not even the colored men who sailed among the crew. The last sounds they heard on earth, apart from the roar of the muskets that belched forth their death, were the kind words spoken by the heroic Fry. When this act of gentleness was done he knelt down with the rest. The men were formed in a line about three feet from the wall. Three paces back of them were the marines, with the muskets at the shoulder. Just before the volley was fired Capt. Fry took off his hat and turned his face upward, as if in prayer. There was one brief moment of pause; then came the flame, the smoke and the roar. As the cloudy curtain lifted, thirty-six of the thirty-seven men were seen writhing in the agonies of a partial death. Poor Fry lay stone dead, a bullet in his head, his calm face upturned toward

According to several eye witnesses the scene that ensued was hideous beyond description. The marines rushed upon the wounded men and began dispatching them with horrible brutality. Thrusting the muzzles of their muskets into the eyes and ears of the dying, these fiends literally blew their heads off. But a still greater horror was at hand. Presently some cavalry appeared, and in order to accelerate the extermination of the victims, the horse soldiers were ordered to ride their steeds over the reeking mass of dying men. This was repeated several times until the last breath of life had been crushed out of the sufferers. After this the troops withdrew, and the rabble were let loose on the human shambles, with the result that for the rest of the day the streets were paraded by processions bearing the heads of the victims on long pikes. Thus ended the bloody orgy of Nov. 4, 1873.

It must not be supposed that this second butchery had quenched Gov. Burriel's thirst for blood. On the contrary, orders were issued by him for the shooting of fifty more of the prisoners—the majority being boys ranging from 16 to 20 years of age—and 3 o'clock on the afternoon of the 5th was the hour set for their execution. At 10 o'clock on the morning of that day, however, a gallant British man-of-war, H. M. S. Niobe, steamed into the harbor of Santiago. As soon as her commander, Sir Lambton Lorraine, heard of the governor's intentions, he quietly trained his guns on the town, and sent word ashore that, in view of the probability that some of the crew of the Virginius were British subjects, he must insist upon a postponement of the execution until the respective governments had been communicated with. Burriel demurred at first, but a second look at the portholes of the Niobe and her decks cleared for action caused him to acquiesce in the demand, and the remainder of the crew and passengers were saved.

The subsequent action of the United States Government, ending in Spain's apology for this unheard-of outrage, and the surrender of the Virginius, together with the survivors of the ill-fated expedition, are matters that do not come within the scope of this article. One little incident, however, emphasizes the absolute devilish cruelty manifested by the officials on this occasion. The day before the survivors of the Virginius, 102 in number, were taken from Moro Castle to Havana, to be turned over to the United States authorities, they were informed by their jailers that their walk on the morrow would be from the cell to the grave. To enhance their sufferings a priest entered the castle and began to shrive them. All night this inhuman torture was indulged in, and when in the morning light streamed in over the frowning walls they all thought it the dawn of their last day on earth. Sadly they fell into line and marched out into the town. All this while the United States vessel Juniata was lying in the harbor awaiting them, and their feelings can be better imagined than described when the welcome truth finally forced itself upon them. This episode was a fitting climax to one of the most hideous chapters in the long story of Spanish oppression and cruelty.

Another Fiddle.

James Whitcomb was a prominent citizen of Indiana in her early days, and he was not only a politician, but one of the best amateur musicians in the country. He composed several pieces for the violin, which was his own chosen instrument, and many are the stories told of him and his fiddle.

At one time he was travelling from Indianapolis to Eastern Indiana, and stopped for the night at a house on a lonely road. He entered the cabin with his companion, and there they found a lame young man called Amos sitting by the fire scraping at an old violin with most disastrous result.

He laid the violin on the bed, and started away to the stable with the horses. Mr. Whitcomb at once took up the violin, tuned it, and when Amos returned was playing light and beautiful airs. Amos was entranced. He sat down and, mouth wide open in wonder, watched the musician. Then Mr. Whitcomb struck up "Hail Columbia," and the youth could bear it no longer. He sprang to his feet.

"If I had fifty dollars," cried he, "I'd give it all for that fiddle! I never heard such music."

Mr. Whitcomb said nothing, but kept on playing. By and by, when he had finished, he laid the violin on the bed. This was the young man's opportunity. He sprang up, seized the instrument, carried it to the fire where he could see more plainly, and turned it over and over, examining every part.

"Mister," he sang out, in high excitement, "I never in my life see two fiddles so much alike as yours and mine!"

Rice-Eaters.

The Fortnightly Review is of the opinion that diet has more or less influence upon character, but does not concede that a vegetable diet renders the eater more gentle than a diet of which animal food forms a part. Vegetarians, it says, are prone to contract the gentleness of our domestic herbivora with the ferocity often displayed by carnivorous animals.

A little reflection, however, shows that the food cannot be the main cause of the disposition in either case. Many of the herbivora are capable of displaying the utmost ferocity. Savage attacks upon inoffensive persons by bulls, horses and stags are by no means uncommon in this country; while in the East "rogue" elephants, wild boars and other herbivorous animals often inflict serious injuries upon human beings who chance to come in their way.

So, likewise, the ordinarily mild Hindu, feeding on rice or wheat flour, is liable to become riotous, uncontrollable and bloodthirsty when influenced by religious fanaticism. Perhaps the mischievous effects upon the habits and disposition, ascribed to animal food, are due to the alcoholic liquors which are consumed at the same time.

The disposition of an average individual leading a temperate life would probably not be altered for the better were he to substitute vegetarian diet for his ordinary fare.

When a man goes away from home, he has a lot of fun, if you let him tell it.

I will sing you now a song
Of a binder light and strong,
With its bolt holes square and right
So you can bolt 'em all up tight;
And no extra wrench will use
To tighten bolts or screws.

It has a spring balanced reel
Which makes it nice to work;
And it is balanced up so nice
It cuts without a jerk.
It has a nice spring seat
Which makes it nice to ride.

This binder has a great drive wheel 10x34 inches, which makes it run very light. The drver thinks he is on a buggy, but when he sees the bundles roll, and all bound so nice and tight, he sees his mistake. It is the Osborne Columbia Binder. If you need anything in the line of farm implements it will pay you to see these goods before you buy.

City Ticket.

The democrats never put up a better ticket in Auburn, than they have this year. They are too well known to require an extended notice.

In the first ward, our candidate for trustee is a young business man of much above the average in point of ability. Charles McClellan has never sought an office, and did not seek this. He was urged to take the nomination, and only after some reluctant waiting could he be induced to accept. It was the judgment of the people, that he was needed on the board, as his business experience would prove of the highest value. There is not a single sound reason to be urged against him. We predict he will make the best trustee the first ward ever had.

In the third ward, Dr. Fitch; is a well known business man, who has for the second time been chosen to make the race for that place. It was only by a misunderstanding of the situation that he was defeated before. We believe he will make a much better officer than the average of those we have had. Give him a good vote at the polls.

Dr. F. M. Hines is also a bright young business man, and one against whom not an adverse criticism can be made. He conducts his own business with care and is eminently successful. These are the kind of men we should put into office. He has never asked for a place. Let our next man in the fourth ward be Dr. Hines.

For marshal, we have chosen G. A. Mader, a man who was born here, and against whom no word was ever said, or can be said. He is active and energetic and if elected, will be conscientious in the discharge of his duty, earning his wages by doing his work and doing it well.

For Clerk, Milo Husselman has proved himself one of the very best, and we have had the place filled by some excellent men. He always has had his books in the best possible shape, and the Board has never had any trouble to get a correct account of all its work. He has since he was a lad, made his own way and done his full share, as he is doing now, for the help of those dependent to a certain extent on him. He should be rewarded.

Charlie Jones has also been chosen several times to succeed himself, and it was because his work in keeping the city's accounts, was always clear and accurate and at all times ready for inspection. Give him his usual majority.

In brief, we say of all these candidates, they are young men, who will have a pride in doing their work well. We believe our best interests will be advanced by electing them.

SURPRISED.

Saturday evening about thirty of the friends and neighbors of Mrs. Frank Olinger, who lives a few miles south of town gave her a grand surprise. The successful plan had been previously arranged by Mr. Olinger and of course she was invited to spend the evening with one of her near neighbors. At about nine o'clock she returned home and entered the house and proceeded to light a lamp. But just then a light appeared and to her great surprise she was surrounded by a company of jolly young people who had gathered to celebrate her 24th birthday. The evening was spent in a real enjoyable manner and at the proper hour refreshments were served which was relished by all. Mr. and Mrs. John Clark of this city were among the number, but the names of the other parties we were unable to learn.

Notice to Bridge Contractors.

Notice is hereby given that sealed proposals will be received at the Auditor's office in the town of Auburn, DeKalb county, Indiana, until 2 o'clock p. m. Wednesday April 29, 1896, for the building and erection of one 75-ft span iron bridge, 16 ft roadway and one 35-ft span iron leg bridge, and 1 wooden bridge 130 ft long with wood abutments and 2 approaches; and at the same proposals will be received for the erection of stone abutments for the 75 ft span iron bridge, according to plans and specifications now on file in the Auditor's office. A certified check for $500, or good and sufficient bond, to have two sureties residing in the county to be approved by the Auditor, must accompany each bid, as a guarantee that the bidder will enter contract within five days if the contract is awarded to him. On signing the contract, good and sufficient security according to law will be required. Privilege is reserved to reject any and all bids.

By orders of the Board of Commissioners of DeKalb county, Indiana.

FRANK A. BORST, Auditor.

Auburn, Indiana, April 12, 1896.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BUTLER.

An infant child of John Pierson died last Sunday.

Ed. Crain, of Ypsilanti, Mich., is visiting with his wife in Butler.

The spring crop of bicycle riders is increasing at a wonderful rate.

E. F. Campbell and Frank Fanning are home for the summer vacation from the Chicago College of Physicians and surgeons.

Dr. Shumaker has removed a dwelling from the north part of town to his own premises and will fit it up for an office.

Mr. Ginder had been a member of the Lutheran church for many years. He was an honest frugal, industrious citizen, a worthy member of the society of his choice and leaves a large circle of relatives and friends to mourn his departure.

Sumner Rose, living near Newville, had a close call from fire last week. Mother Bradley aged and feeble who lives with them, accidently set her clothing on fire, and but for the presence of mind of little Sadie, their adopted daughter, would have perished in the flames. The little maiden at the risk of her own life, extinguised the fire after the dress had been literarly burned off of the aged lady, then called for help is extinguish the fire that had already gained considerable headway in the house. The property loss is covered by insurance but mother Bradley will be several weeks recovering from her burns.

Died at his home in Butler, Ind., April 14, 1896. In the seventy-fourth years of his age, Jacob Ginder. The deceased was born in the of city Worms, in Germany Nov. 6, 1822, in the public schools of which city he received his his early education. At the age of eleven he emigrated to this country with his parents settling in Seneca, Co. Ohio. In 1838, removing to Wayne Co., and in 1840 to Richland Co. where he remained fourteen years, and in 1854, removed to DeKalb Co., settling in Wilmington township, where he purchased two hundred acres of land at $10 per acre, paying about one half down and balance in later payments. For several years after his settlement in the Co, conducted an ashery assisted by Elias Fisher, now living about three miles southwest of Garrett. He also engaged for a time in threshing grain, and in managing a saw mill but had sufficient business ability to escape bankruptcy in both callings. On Jan. 10, 1840, in Richland Co. Ohio, he was united in marriage with Margaret Miller, a native of Germany. So meager were his financial circumstances, that he did not have money enough to pay the officer for performing the ceremoney, and chopped wood for him to pay for the service. To them were born eleven children, five only, two sons and three daughters surviving him, together with his aged widow who is five years his senior. His funeral took place from the Lutheran church last Thursday, Rev. Dustman officiating. His remains were laid to rest in the cemetery on his old farm where he performed many a hard day's work removing the heavy timber from the land.

WATERLOO.

Dr. John lectured at the M. E. church Saturday night.

Fred Waterman has moved his family into town. They occupy the Danks property.

Mrs. C. A. O. McClellan came over to Waterloo on the noon train Wednesday.

At the two entertainments given by the Daughters of Rebecca about forty dollars was received.

There was some hail in the showers Monday, some being as large as hickory nuts.

Wednesday, April 15, Mrs. Ab. Kelley spent the day at Fort Wayne. Mrs. Winslow visited Auburn on business the same day.

Messrs. Neff Bros. are at work on land in the southwest part of town, which they have leased for three years, for a brick yard. They are from Bryan and understand their business. The owners of the burnt district expect this new firm will supply them with brick.

The members of the Minerva Club completed the study of Morris' Elements of Civilization, Tuesday the 14th, on which they have been engaged for nearly two years. The class assembled at the home of Mrs. Juliette Dickinson, together with the two resident members, Mrs. A. B. Darby and Mrs. Mary Morell, also Mrs. M. Beidler, of Auburn. After the usual time spent in carrying out the program for that date, and adjournment, it became evident the hostess had arranged a delightful surprise for her guests. By request Mrs Winslow said grace, after which, Mrs. Dickinson, Sr., ably assisted by Mrs. E. Dickinson and Mrs. Ed Ettinger, served a very dainty and appetizing repast in three courses, interspersed with toasts as follows: "Our Progress," responded to by Mrs. Florence Waterman "Our Children," to which Mrs. Carrie Francis responded; followed by a recitation by Mrs. Olive Long, entitled "Jimmie." In the absence of Mrs. Mary Boozer, Mrs. Winslow, who was also toast mistress, in a few words welcomed "Our New Members," Mrs. Dan Leas and Mrs. Ella Boozer. After a time spent in pleasant conversation and a vote of thanks to the hostess, "a little lingering, as if loth to leave," the separation came, each with another pleasant memory to cherish, and more love in the heart.

—During the winter of 1883, F. M. Martin of Long Reach, West Va., contracted a severe cold which left him with a cough. In speaking of how he cured it he says: "I used several kinds of cough syrup but found no relief until I bought a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough remedy, which relieved me almost instantly, and in a short time brought about a complete cure." When troubled with a cough or cold use this remedy and you will not find it necessary to try several kinds before you get relief. It has been in the market for over twenty years and constantly grown in favor and popularity. For sale at 25 and 50 cents per bottle by Davenport the Druggist. 14-18.

—John H. Krontz of Butler was here yesterday. As his school has closed he is taking a brief rest.

—Dr. Edwards the new dentist is meeting with good success.

—Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Smith, of Helmer, Ind., are visiting in the city.

—Mrs. Frank Rose and mother Mrs. Rother, of Garrett, were in the city this afternoon.

—Mrs. Wes St. Clair and children returned to their home at Bethel, Mich., to-day after a week's visit with friends and relatives here.

—R. M. Lockhart and wife drove over from Waterloo to-day. J. Loewenstein of the same place, was also here.

—Mr. and Mrs. Benninghoff, of St. Joe, were here this forenoon, on business.

—We sell the Reliable and Quick Meal gasoline stoves. Brown, Culbertson & Boland.

—Mrs. Wayne Zonker, of Fairfield, was here to-day and made this office a call.

—The hot weather struck us suddenly. The mercury was 85 in the shade to-day.

—Geo. Dawson, of Richland, was in town to-day on business, as was also Hon. Marion Franks.

—Rev. W. W. Lineberry of St. Joe was in the city last evening. He came up to attend the Ben Hur lodge.

—Marriage licenses have been issued to Frank Gushwa and Rosa Zimmerman and Ira Casselman and Lizzie Wallace.

—Amos Zervis is moving out of the rooms over the Kessler cigar factory. We understand Mr. Henchen will move into the same rooms.

—Busy people have no time, and sensible people have no inclination to use a slow remedy. One Minute Cough Cure acts promptly and gives permanent results. Davenport the Druggists.

—Take a dose of DeWitt's Little Early Risers just for the good they will do you. These little Pills are good for indigestion, good for headache, good for liver complaint, good for constipation. They are good. Davenport the Druggist.

—Will Latson, who has been employed so long at Shull's shoe store, has so far recovered from his recent illness as to be out again. He started to-day for Michigan, where he has a sister living in Benzie county. He will remain there several weeks and take a rest.

—Kendallville Sun:—Peru lays claim to the largest M. E. church membership in the North Indiana conference. The number is now 975, over 300 having been added during the past conference year and it is said to have the largest Junior Epworth League in the world.

—It's just as easy to try One Minute Cough Cure as any thing else. It's easier to cure a severe cough or cold with it. Let your next purchase for a cough be One Minute Cough Cure. Better medicine; better result; better try it. Davenport the Druggist.

—A. L. McEnterfer, of Waterloo, is moving the old Ralston building assisted by Charley Meeks, Leo Mergy, Clint DeLong and several other men. It is a pretty hard building to move, as the frame work is all heavy timbers. Even the joists under the floor are of logs about ten inches in diameter hewed on one side so the floor would lie even. It was built about 1856, and we presume the late S. W. Ralston did the work himself. The family by some of its members has occupied it so long that the change will be notice.

—We have received the first copy of the Hudson Telegram, a new weekly paper to be published in that lively little town. It is a 7-column folio, the same size as the DAILY COURIER and bids fair to be a newsy sheet. It starts out with a fair advertising patronage, which argues well for its future success. The editor and publisher, is Wm. Kist, and if we mistake not, he is one of the "Kist Brothers" who have for several years, conducted, a successful paper, the "Record" at Pierceton, in Kosciko county. Their father at one time published the "Review" now the "Herald" in Butler. The COURIER hopes to see the Telegram succeed.

—Clarence Hawkins, wife and daughter were guests yesterday and last night at Cook Ford's. Their home is in Hicksville.

—Miss Bird Best, who has been visiting friends here for a time, has gone to Ann Arbor, and will spend a few weeks with the old neighbors there.

—SPECTACLES FOUND: Chas. Crew an employe of the "Dinger" cigar factory, found a pair of steel rim spectacles near the Farmers Bank. Owner may have same by calling at the cigar factory and paying for this notice.

—In a recent lecture in New York, Col. Carroll D. Wright gave the average wages earned, as found by the census, as follows: $247.38 in 1850; $248.94 in 1860; $302,08 in 1870; $346.91 in 1880; $444.83 in 1890. These are the average yearly wages.

—Eugene H. Betz, of Ashley, came down to Auburn, yesterday on his wheel. It was a pretty hot ride, but he started home fresh as a daisy. His school is out, and he thinks some of starting west next week, stopping first at DesMoines, but may continue till he joins Job Reinoehl, S. C. Urey and Dr. Rudolph at Alhambra, California.

Byron Brant an employe of the Kiblinger Carriage Works met with a very painful accident just a few moments before quitting time last night. He was in the act of driving the boxing in a carriage wheel when another employe ran against the wheel. He was holding an iron with one hand and using a sledge in the other. When the wheel was moved he missed the iron and struck his thumb. It was a very painful accident and one that will keep him from work for several days.

—The Auburn Summer Normal will begin Monday June 1st and continue six weeks. This earlier date than previous years, it is thought, will accommodate the greater number.

SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR

THE BEST

is SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR—don't forget to take it. The Liver gets sluggish during the Winter, just like all nature, and the system becomes choked up by the accumulated waste, which brings on Malaria, Fever and Ague and Rheumatism. You want to wake up your Liver now, but be sure you take SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR to do it. It also regulates the Liver—keeps it properly at work, when your system will be free from poison and the whole body invigorated.

You get THE BEST BLOOD when your system is in A1 condition, and that will only be when the Liver is kept active. Try a Liver Remedy once and note the difference. But take only SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR—it is SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR which makes the difference. Take it in powder or in liquid already prepared, or make a tea of the powder; but take SIMMONS LIVER REGULATOR. You'll find the RED Z on every package. Look for it.

Personal Politics.

—The first personal attack on J. M. Robinson, democratic candidate for congress comes from the Butler Record. That paper blames Mr. R. for "not declaring his principles." And now while on that subject it might be in order for the Record to ask both candidates to "declare their principles." Mr. Leighty has been in congress since last December, and was elected in November of the year before. Yet as far as we can recall, he has never "declared himself." Sauce for Robinson should be sauce for Leighty.

Success doesn't always bring happiness and contentment. The dentist who has the biggest pull always looks quite down in the mouth.

The Minneapolis Journal remarks that "a woman suing for damages and holding a set of love letters is a terror to men and angels." What have angels to do with it?

Two footpads attempted to hold up a member of the Ohio Legislature in a corridor of the State House at Columbus. But they succeeded in escaping before he robbed them.

Scientists say the time is coming when we shall be able to talk with the planets. The necessity for more talk is not urgent, but any improvement in the quality will be thankfully received.

The habit of intellectual suspense is a most wholesome and valuable one, especially where the spirit and actions of another are concerned; and nothing tends more effectually to prevent unjust and cruel criticism.

All that a man has to do in a place where he is a stranger is to bridle his tongue and his temper, cultivate good feeling and kind affections, and meet every advance of his neighbor with courtesy, cordiality and cheerfulness.

There is often in one kind word, one look of sympathizing affection, or one small act of disinterested love, more of real nobleness of spirit than in actions which have rung in the ears and found an echo in the hearts of admiring thousands.

The cost of electric power in the great railway tunnel of Baltimore is rapidly declining, and in a short time will be no greater than that of steam. Electricity in the industries is marching on with a steady and certain sweep.

The Boston Advertiser, which carries at its editorial masthead the proud statement that it is "a paper for the best classes exclusively," prints a two-column account of a dog fight. But perhaps this is what the best classes in Boston want.

If Cuba should win its independence Spain will have no reason to regard the event as a deep humiliation. England had to take the same medicine over a hundred years ago, and the colonies she lost have done so well that she is not half sorry.

An electrical exchange says: "St. Louis is in very bad shape electrically. Let us hope the wires will be put under ground before the convention crowds arrive." Here's a shocking proposition! What's the matter with St. Louis matrons, anyway?

Taste, if it means anything but a paltry connoisseurship, must mean general susceptibility to truth and nobleness, a sense to discern and a heart to love and reverence all beauty, order, goodness, wheresoever or in whatever forms and accomplishments they are to be seen.

The duke of Veragua has been waxing exceeding saucy toward the United States of late. This probably comes from Tom Palmer's "Veragua relief fund," which, when last heard from, stood at $1.68. It isn't wise to make these foreign paupers independently wealthy all at once.

Conduct is at once the aim and the test of all our learning, our thinking, and striving. The man lives most perfectly whose most constant happiness is found in the consciousness that, in doing the best he can for himself, he is also doing the best that he can for every being that is capable of having good done to it.

England's decision to spend $100,000,000 in building new war-ships this year would be more formidable if the fact were not known that the ships already completed are decidedly short of sailors. A landsman transferred at short notice to a modern battle-ship is about as effective as a Spanish infantryman on a Cuban mule.

Out in Kansas a judge has ruled that "if a man calls on a girl several times and escorts her to entertainments occasionally he is legally engaged to marry her." That judge evidently is susceptible to outside influences. If an old maid asked him to do so he probably would issue an injunction to prevent the rising of the moon or would cheerfully declare unconstitutional the laws of nature.

In a recent Sioux Falls divorce trial the fair plaintiff testified that for the first three years of her married life her husband kissed her at least 100 times a day. But at the expiration of that time he began to lag in his attentions, sometimes not kissing her more than a dozen times every twenty-four hours. The brute! This unfortunate young woman is clearly entitled to a separation on the ground of extreme cruelty.

If we could trace out the needless suffering inflicted by men upon each other, we should find a large majority of it to be quite unintentional, involuntary, and even unknown to those who caused it. No plea in excuse is more frequent than that there has been no such purpose. Men forget that "Evil is wrought by want of thought as well as by want of heart." That they meant no harm to their neighbors or friends or the public is well; but their responsibility did not end there. They should have been very sure that their acts were as free from harm as their intentions.

Some people may wonder why a scientist should devote time and energy to the task of securing quantitive measurements of sensibility in persons of different ages and different classes of society. To the careless or the ignorant a thermaesthesiometer or an algesimeter is of no consequence whatever, but that such delicate aids to psychological study have great value will be evident even to the masses in the near future. Dr. Arthur MacDonald, who is a specialist in the United States Bureau of Education, has developed some interesting neuro-social data. Of especial moment are those that relate to school children; one thousand seven hundred and seven having been the subjects of the doctor's simple experiments. Whatever may be the scientific value of Dr. MacDonald's measurements their practical value amounts to much. A tabular statement of average sensibility as to locality, heat and pain has been prepared, presenting which the doctor says that any pupil 20 per cent. about or below these averages for its age should be reported to the family physician; ought, perhaps, to be taken away from school or if permitted to remain should not be required to do the average amount of school work. Bright pupils with weak bodies are now too common, but with the assistance of the clever psychologist they may enjoy a measure of relief sufficient to give the physical self a chance to catch up with the over rapidly developing mind. Practical science is only the refinement of common sense.

Chicago Times-Herald: A poor negro, long out of work which he had diligently sought, mad with hunger and desperate against society, saw a purse lying in the lap of a woman riding in a street car. He seized the money bag, ran, was pursued, overtaken, and, with a certain penitentiary fate ahead, cut his throat. The fashion that, depriving women of pockets, compels them to carry purses and other articles of value exposed to the vision of poverty and want, is brutal. It is amazing that women, right minded, kind-hearted and rational in all other things, condescend to submit to it. They are miserable slaves of dressmakers. Dressmakers are slaves of style. There was never a style that so idiotically ruled a sex, and there was never a time when that sex claimed to be more intelligent or half as independent. "Lead us not into temptation" ought to be carried on the corsage of every woman, as of old the fable placed on the breast the bag containing the wearer's foibles. The poor, low whom the sight of a woman's display purse drove first to robbery, then to suicide leaving a family to the mercy of the world, is not the first victim of a fashion that for its cure only needs a pair of scissors to cut a pocket hole or to rip open a seam to make place for a pleat that would conceal access to a pocket, without detracting from the grace of the garment. Cannot the Woman's Club and the various other philanthropic aggregations of women of which we see and hear so much spare a little time from aesthetics, poetry, parliamentary law, political economy, and other higher kindergartening to devote a little time to expounding that very old but always salutary phrase, "Lead us not into temptation?" Which, being contemporaneously translated, means: Women, in heaven's name, put pockets in your gowns and stop driving men to felony and suicide. The grand jury has done in its day worse things than bringing in a moral indictment of women who carry purses in their hands and watches secured only by frail stickpins on their busts.

A Bee-Hunt.

An Australian savage comes up to an Irishman's idea of human skill, for "he bates the bees." A native seldom fails to get honey when he discovers the bee he has been watching for. The following description of a native's bee hunt is given in Mr. Arthur's "Kangaroo and Kauri:"

Warruyallah, the chief of a tribe, went with two little nets to a small pool, filled his mouth with water, and then lying down, his head hanging over the pool, he remained quiet for an hour, apparently looking at his own reflection in the water. Then the hum of a bee was heard. Buzz-z-z it went over the pool, round the black's head, now on one side, now on the other, and now close to his ear; but not a motion betrayed the bee-hunter.

But when the bee, dropping close to the water, gave notice by the change of its tune that it was about to sip, the chief, with a snort, squirted the water from his mouth over the little "buzzer." Before it had time to recover from the unexpected douche, he seized it dexterously by the wings.

Then he prepared it for the chase by fastening to it a bunch of wild cotton with some gum. The bee was let go; it made for the hive, slowly at first on account of its novel burden, which impeded its progress and showed a sign in the air for the chief to follow. Over bramble and brake went the chief, accompanied by the men of his tribe, and in half an hour halted at the foot of an immense gum-tree, into whose top the bee had gone.

The chief mounted quickly, but cutting notches into the bark with his stone tomahawk. In a short time he brought down a quantity of honeycomb, a small piece only of which contained honey. The Australian bees are stingless.

Compliment to a Soldier.

During the siege of Paris Marshal Canrobert found himself for a moment in the presence of a party of ladies. They were very much agitated. "What is the matter, ladies?" the marshal asked.

"The matter?" said Madame Brohan in whose house the people were assembled. "Why, we are on the eve of battle, and I suppose fear affects us."

"Fear?" echoed the marshal, looking about with a puzzled air.

Madame Brohan rang her bell.

"Marie," she said, when the maid appeared, "bring a dictionary for the marshal!"

Which was as much as to say that the old commander did not know the meaning of the word.

They Never Move.

There are but two European potentates who manage to get along without change of residence. These are the Pope of Rome and the Sultan of Turkey. The Sultan has never left Constantinople since he ascended the throne in such tragic circumstances nineteen years ago, and his Holiness has remained within the precincts of the Vatican since the triple tiara was placed upon his head.

With most of your friends, you treasure up things they occasionally do or say that offend you.

INDIANA'S FAVORITE SON.

GOVERNOR CLAUDE MATTHEWS.

The earnest efforts which have been inaugurated by Indiana Democrats to secure the presidential nomination for Gov. Matthews are bearing such fruit that his friends are looking forward with confidence to his triumph at Chicago. Though Indiana has put forward candidates for the presidency before, it is conceded that the canvass now in progress is singular in the fact that it embraces all shades of Democratic sentiment. The reason of the cordial unanimity in the Governor's support is his personal popularity, coupled with the firm belief that the party could win the national contest with a Western man. The three years of Gov. Matthews' administration have been clean years, free from official scandal and pregnant with energy and executive ability. In all the relations that he has borne to the people he has secured their approval and, by a dignified, conservative and fearless discharge of his duty, has intensified the admiration of party friends and won the respect of his party enemies. His official acts have received commendation from the Republican and independent press in as great measure as praise was accorded him by the Democratic papers. His private life, like his official career, has been above reproach, and his supporters believe that a campaign with him as the party leader would inspire confidence in the people and lend enthusiasm to the Democrats that no other candidate would give.

Indiana Democrats believe that the West has long enough paid obeisance to the East in the matter of selecting candidates for the presidency, and they look forward to the consummation in the Governor's nomination of the hope which the party has long cherished of being permitted to vote for a Western man. They claim that the West, Northwest and South give the votes that must elect the Democratic candidate, and assert that it is the Eastern Democrats that have always caused the party plans to miscarry. While it is not intended to make the canvass of the Governor sectional, it is believed that the time has come when the Democratic party should break away from the entanglements which have always followed from the differences between the Western and Eastern Democrats on the tariff. It is therefore in the West and South that the friends of the Governor are making efforts for his nomination, and the reports from these sections in answer to letters sent out by the Democratic managers inspire the belief that the executive will have a large following in the Chicago convention. One of the strong points that the Governor's friends are urging in his behalf is the fact that he is both a Southern and a Northern man, Southern by virtue of birth and education and Northern by location and habit since he attained his majority, and thus fully in sympathy with the ideas, needs and sentiments of the two localities. On this account, it is assumed, he will be acceptable both to the North and the South, and it is with this idea in view that his campaign is now being managed.

Gov. Claude Matthews is a Kentuckian by birth. He was born in Bath County in 1845. He is well preserved, and would ordinarily be regarded as much younger, for the years have dealt kindly with him. His hair is slightly tinged with gray, his step is elastic, his movements quick and energetic, and his manner animated. He weighs about 170 pounds, has a round, full face, a cordial grasp of the hand and a pleasant smile. The Governor was reared upon a farm, and when 18 years of age entered Center College at Danville, Ky., from which he was graduated in 1868. In the meantime he met his wife, Miss Martha Whitcomb, daughter of Gov. and later United States Senator Whitcomb. One year after Matthews' graduation they were married and came to Vermilion County to live. From that time till 1890, when he came to Indianapolis as Secretary of State, he resided upon a farm of several hundred acres near Clinton, and devoted himself to its culture and to stock raising. His interest in improved breeds of stock led him to organize the Indiana Shorthorn Breeders' Association several years ago, and he was its president for several years.

In 1878 Matthews was elected to the House of Representatives from Clinton County, and in 1890 he was nominated for State Senator in the same district. The supposed necessity of nominating a farmer to head the State ticket in the same year called attention to him as the most available man for Secretary of State, and he was nominated by the State convention for that office. He made an energetic campaign, speaking in nearly all the counties in the State, and was elected by the phenomenal majority for Indiana of 21,000. Two years later he was asked to enter the race for the governorship, but withheld his consent until the eve of the State convention. Many of the counties had refused to instruct for the other candidates, and when the delegates reached the city and found Matthews actively in the race there was a hegira to his standard, and he was nominated on the first ballot. Matthews had been almost unanimously nominated in two conventions, and the ease with which he won inspired confidence and generated enthusiasm among his friends. While not an eloquent speaker, he proved a greater success on the hustings in 1892 than in the preceding campaign. The campaign was not a brilliant one in the ordinary sense, for there was a dearth of pyrotechnics, but a Democratic majority of 7,000 testified to the aggressive spirit which the Democrats had manifested throughout the campaign.

The acts that have particularly distinguished the Governor's courageous convictions and determination of purpose are in connection with the State Board of Equalization, of which he was a member when Secretary of State, and president by virtue of his office of Governor. Prior to 1890 the railroad property of the State had been assessed at about $60,000,000, but the Legislature passed a new law and it was determined to bring corporate property to the basis of assessment which obtained in other cases. The board at once added nearly $100,000,000 to the railroad valuation, and this has stood since 1890 with but few modifications. When Matthews was nominated for Governor and President Ingalls, of the "Big Four," was asked for a contribution to the Democratic campaign fund, he replied in effect that he would give nothing and hoped that Matthews, whom he styled a demagogue, would be defeated. The Governor turned Ingalls' letter to good account among the farmers of the State, and the tact with which he used it to show the attitude of corporations toward a just assessment no doubt made many votes for the ticket. The railroads united in resisting the assessment, but the United States Supreme Court sustained it at every point. Ingalls then came before the board to ask for reductions on certain roads, and the Governor was one of the first members of the board to realize that some minor discriminations had been made against the "Big Four" properties and to suggest modifications. The railroad president admitted that he had misconceived the character of the Governor and the two have been friends ever since.

GOVERNOR CLAUDE MATTHEWS.

In less than six months after entering upon the duties of Governor, Matthews was called upon to face a most serious situation. The coal miners of southeastern Indiana were on a strike, and conditions bordering on anarchy resulted in those localities. The strikers refused to permit any coal to be moved from the banks, and trains were ditched that attempted to transport it through the State. The Governor ordered out the militia, and after several days, order was completely restored and traffic resumed without interruption. It then developed that there was no provision for paying the companies that had taken the field. The Governor pledged his personal credit to the banks for the money to pay them, and the needed amount was thus raised. The strike of the American Railway Union again presented grave conditions, and again resort was had to the military to suppress lawlessness and protect property. In this instance the Governor acted promptly and ably seconded the President in bringing order out of the chaos that existed in northern Indiana.

But the most stubborn class of lawbreakers with which the executive has had to deal was the men engaged in prize fighting in Lake County, and afterward in winter racing. Against both of these he invoked the law, and supported it in the case of the Columbian Athletic Club with the military power of the State, taking possession of the club's property, and eventually winding up the association in the courts. Close upon the heels of the Columbian Athletic Club came the Roby Racing Association, whose object was to conduct winter racing in Lake County. The Governor sent a special agent to the scene, and from his reports and the general reputation of the association, he came to the conclusion that the race meetings were made the rendezvous of thugs, gamblers and criminals. On his recommendation the Legislature passed a law prohibiting horse racing during the winter months, but it required a Supreme Court decision to settle the question.

In respect to public questions, the Governor, though conservative, does not hesitate to take advanced ground. He was one of the first public men in the country to advocate the recognition by this Government of the belligerent rights of the Cuban patriots.

Looking back over his record and forward to its continued merit, should conditions arise that require firmness of purpose and promptness of action, the Indiana Democrats say that he is well worthy of the confidence of the country and of the indorsement of his party by a call to come up higher. In the governorship he has developed rare qualities of patience in investigation, conservatism in action and promptness and determination when a policy has once been decided upon.

Machine Guns.

It has been calculated that a ten-barreled machine gun is equal in intensity and endurance of fire to an entire company of infantry at full war strength.

More Protection for German Meat.

The agitation for the exclusion of American meats from Germany has recently been renewed in the Prussian Legislature, a story of an old woman who was alleged to have been made ill by eating too much American corned beef serving as an excuse for an attack on all kinds of our meat exports. A strong sentiment against American meats was shown to exist among the representatives of the German landlords.

From the standpoint of the German meat producers, who are simply trying to carry out the doctrines of the American McKinleyites, it is, of course, highly desirable that the importation of the cheap meats of the United States should be forbidden. With a monopoly of the entire home market the German meat raisers would be enabled to charge much higher prices, and the landlords would get bigger rents.

But the forty-five millions of Germans who are not engaged in the meat business would find the exclusion of American meats a serious hardship. Each and everyone of them would be compelled to pay more for an important article of their daily food, and the poorest classes would find it impossible to get as much meat as they need. The result would be that the masses of the people would be underfed, or robbed, by monopoly prices, for the sole advantage of the rich aristocrats who own the soil of Germany.

While thus injuring the great majority of the German people, the exclusion of American meats would also severely injure our own farmers. With the loss of an important market the price of meats in this country would quickly fall, and a large number of our stock raisers would find themselves unable to dispose of their products. This would mean ruin to many farmers who are now prosperous, and who would have only protection to thank for their losses.

The American farmer has only to figure out for himself the probable result of all the countries to which he sells his products enacting trade-excluding laws, to see that protection is a dangerous system, which curses both the people adopting it and those against whom it is aimed. When it becomes sound public policy to shut our cheap wholesome meats out of Germany, then and then only will there be any justification for the protective swindle.

A Sample Calamity Yawp.

Under the scare heading "Wilson Law Prosperity" the New York Press published a number of news items referring to strikes and business difficulties in the textile industry. This was intended to show that the Wilson tariff has not given business to incompetent mill owners, nor has it enabled factories using old out-of-date machinery to compete with more enterprising mills. Among other alleged effects of the low tariff was the following: "A strike was inaugurated at the works of the Firth Carpet Company, West Cornwall, N. Y., the latter part of last week, by six boys, who refused to work on the new fast machines, and were promptly dismissed. The action of the superintendent, who, it is claimed, also discharged the relatives of the boys, so incensed the operatives that they all went out."

Nothing can be clearer to the muddled protectionist mind than that this strike is due to the wicked Wilson law. If good Mr. McKinley's tariff was in force the bad boys would never think of refusing to work on new machines. So there would have been no strike, and the Press would have had no calamity howl to use as an argument for restoring a panic-breeding tariff. Great is the wisdom of the pessimistic weepers who run Republican organs.

Fat Friers in Front as Usual.

The fat-frier of the present seems to have the call in the Republican party over the Credit Mobilier statesman of long ago. Mr. Allison has been respectable too long to make him a hot favorite for Republican honors. The most prominent man in the latest "iniquity" stands the best chance. William McKinley leads all the rest. He commands the most "fat."—Utica Observer.

Trying to Tax Foreigners.

The New Hampshire Republican State convention distinguished itself by inserting in its platform the old high tariff chestnut: "The foreigner pays the tax." After some sterotyped abuse of the Democracy for "three years of disappointment, privation and distress," the Granite State Republicans demanded "the speedy repeal of the Democratic tariff and the substitution thereof of one based upon the principles of the McKinley act, for the procurement of national revenues as far as possible from foreigners who market their merchandise in competition with our productions."

It is just possible that the benighted McKinleyites of New Hampshire are still living in the mists and darkness of the ages when it was believed that taxes on imports were paid by the foreign producer. Whether real or assumed their ignorance shows that in spite of our great public school system there is still a deplorable need of the study of elementary arithemetic. If the men who talk of collecting revenues from foreigners were able to add and subtract correctly, they would not try to impose their theory on the public. The notion that duties on goods are not paid by the consumer cannot be honestly held by any one who understands that two and two make four, or that five from six leaves one.

The facts of every day business experience show so plainly the absurdity of the delusion that we can tax the people of other countries for the support of our government, that it is unnecessary to seriously argue against it. A mind so constituted that it believes that although the importer adds the customs duties to the price of the goods he buys from abroad and the retailer charges the tariff tax to the price at which the goods are finally sold, the foreign producer pays the additional cost due to the tariff, cannot be influenced by facts or logic. The idea put into the platform of the New Hampshire Republicans is not a doctrine or a theory, but a superstition, and will only disappear when the people become generally enlightened. In 1892 a majority of more than a million Americans by their votes showed that they knew who pays the tariff taxes. In 1896 the majority against McKinley scheme for higher duties should be even larger. By 1946 even the New Hampshire protectionists may find out that taxes are always paid by the consumers of the goods on which they are imposed.

International Trade.

A protectionist, whose letter to the Herald was printed in full on the 14th inst., seeks to bolster up the old theory that if the value of a nation's imports exceeds the value of its exports it has an adverse balance of trade, and is impoverished to that extent. To make out this proposition he relies upon the supposed case of a farmer who sells $2,000 worth of his farm products in a year and buys $3,000 worth of goods from outside.

The writer assumes that merchants in the international trade are simpletons, such as he depicts his imaginary farmer. The two cases are essentially different. Our importers do not import what they cannot sell, and the people do not buy 50 per cent. more of imported goods than they need.

If our importers import more than home consumption demands, their capital enables them usually to hold the surplus till the demand equals the supply. Moreover, in international trade any country's imports are what it gets in return for its exports of its surplus production—which if not exported would in some cases perish or rot. If our agriculturists and mill owners cannot produce and export more than the home market consumes, they must at times let their lands and mills lie idle. Every tariff duty or restriction on our imports necessarily injures our export trade, and is therefore a blow dealt at both our capital and labor.

Is it not perfectly clear that when the ascertained value of our imports most exceeds that of our exports our foreign trade is, as a rule, most profitable, and the balance of trade is not adverse but really favorable?—New York Herald.

Responsibility Already Located.

It is somewhat amusing to note the efforts of Republican papers to put the blame of the do-nothing policy in Congress on the Democratic minority. In legislation the minority cannot be blamed for anything. The majority has the power and is responsible for the legislation. Some days since Speaker Reed announced that the Republican party had the responsibility for the legislation of this session and was ready to accept it. The people will recognize no other responsibility.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

Harrison as the Bogy Man.

There begins to be a tinge of seriousness, especially to the McKinley forces, in the candidacy of Harrison, which refuses to be downed. The New York end of the political wires is becoming much agitated, and the leaders have convened to discuss the new condition of affairs.—Dubuque Times.

No Colored Delegates.

If there are any colored delegates going to the Republican national convention from the North we have not yet chanced on their names. And yet the Northern Republicans claim the ownership of the negro vote in the North.—Peoria Herald.

Too Near the Fire Alarm Statesman.

The managers of the McKinley boom will make a fatal mistake if they permit Mr. Forraker to sit too near that large consignment of fireworks they have ordered for their St. Louis display.—Washington Post.

INDIANA INCIDENTS.

RECORD OF EVENTS OF THE PAST WEEK.

Mine Operator Arrested for Issuing Metal Checks in Lieu of Money—Successful Meeting of Southern Indiana Teachers.

"Straw Money" Men Arrested.

United States Marshal Hawkins, of Indianapolis, went down into the block coal mining district the other day and confiscated $80,000 of "straw money." Seven mine operators and mine merchants were arrested for selling these token coins as money. The men under arrest are Nathan Y. Dixon of the Summit Coal Company, Finney Strong of the Linton Supply Company, Frank Martin of the Linton Coal Company, John W. Wolford, a clothing merchant at Linton, and Wolford's three sons. For some time it has been the custom of mine operators to issue to miners before pay day metal checks, which were made to represent money value. Merchants also issued the checks and they passed into general circulation in the mining district as money or its equivalent. The checks were known in the district as "straw money." They circulated at a 10 per cent discount usually, but always brought their full face value when presented to the company that issued them. The coins range in denomination from 5 cents to $1. When times were "hard" in the mining district it was the custom to do business almost exclusively with these checks. No effort was ever made to pass them outside the mining district. So scarce is money in the district that John W. Wolford, one of the men arrested, had to borrow money to pay car fare. There were several thousand dollars of checks in his office. The men have been placed under bond of $500 each. The Government recently sent an inspector into the district who reported to Washington the facts on which the prosecutions were ordered.

Indiana Teachers Adjourn.

The Southern Indiana Teachers' Association, which closed its session at Washington Friday night, was generally credited with being the most interesting and best managed ever held. There was an enrollment of nearly 700. An interesting program was carried out. Resolutions were adopted favoring the building of an "Abraham Lincoln Art Institute" and a committee was appointed to draft and send a memorial to Congress urging the matter forward. Officers as follows were elected: President, W. H. Senour, Brookville; vice-president, Mrs. A. R. Horn, Brookville, Evansville; Mrs. Hattie Head, Washington; secretary, Jennie Deming, Shelbyville; treasurer, J. A. Carnagay, Columbus; executive committee, Superintendent Feathergill, Profs. R. A. Ogg, P. A. Mott, W. H. Hershman and F. D. Churchell. Franklin was selected as the next meeting place.

Miss Garbison Is Arrested.

At South Bend, Miss Harriet Garbison was arrested, charged with the theft of a horse and buggy from a man named Garwood, living near Laporte. The young woman is 18 years old and came from Starke County, Ind. She had been working on the Garwood farm for eleven weeks when she made up her mind to leave, taking with her a horse and buggy and Mrs. Garwood's gold watch. Two girls went with her, but the trio got into a fight and Miss Garbison left the others. They had driven in all over 100 miles, driving by night. Tiring of the trip, Miss Garbison sold the buggy to a farmer for $35, and as she could not find sale for the horse, gave it away. Miss Garbison is said to have made a confession to Chief Cassidy.

All Over the State.

At Muncie, William C. Pyle is dead of cancer, resulting from a strain received while lifting a heavy burden some two months ago. He belonged in Bellaire, O., and was betrothed in marriage to Miss Ella Hutchings, of Muncie.

Noah Arnold, a married man, about 40 years of age, a member of one of the most prominent Dunkard families of Indiana, attempted suicide by cutting his throat at Rensselaer. He will probably die. He recently lost his sight, which probably affected his mind.

About twelve years ago Miss Ella Abbott went to Lebanon and entered the millinery business. Two years later she disappeared. Thursday John O'Brien, of Lexington, Ky., arrived in search of her. He claims she has a legacy amounting to several thousand dollars awaiting her. No clew to her whereabouts has been found.

Hallie Shafer was released from jail at Muncie by Judge Koons, after being kept for three months on the charge of being illegally married. In January Miss Shafer, who is white and quite pretty, was married to James Walker, a negro. Each was placed in jail and have since been held. In his finding Judge Koons says the white or black woman who marries the opposite sex is not guilty of crime according to Indiana statutes, but that it is a felonious act on the part of the man, and Walker will likely get a term in State prison. The Shafer girl has parents near Newcastle, who are highly regarded.

An appalling accident occurred on the Belt Railway Monday morning at Bedford, when an engine and one car loaded with stone went through a sixty-five-foot trestle, killing five men instantly and badly injuring two others, one of whom has since died. The dead: ——Bevins, Sherman Carpenter, Charles Davis, Warren Leonard, —— Masterson, Charles Ogden. The injured: Henry De Vaull, —— Menzer. Henry De Vaull, the brakeman, was standing on the rear end of the car and jumped when he felt the trestle giving way, catching on the timbers and thus saving his life. The injuries of Engineer George Menzer, aside from being scalded, amount only to a small cut in the head and one in the breast.

After much difficulty Sheriff Strahn made a clever capture of two strangers at Winchester. They were selling pocketknives and revolvers on the street. When searched ninety-six knives and revolvers were found on them. They gave fictitious names.

Mrs. Mary Suhr, of Kokomo, has sued Charles Kirkhoff for $30,000 damages for breach of promise to marry. Mary alleges that Charles jilted her, yes Suhr, and married a sweet creature named Sophie Syrup. If this candied statement can be substantiated we hope Charles will be stuck for a good round sum.

Thomas Evans, a glass-blower, of Anderson, committed suicide by drinking carbolic acid.

One year ago a gas well was drilled on the Eaton farm, near Ekin, and a tremendous flow of water shot high into the air, continuing until much of the country around the well was submerged. It was a magnificent sight while it lasted, and was visited by thousands of people. Finally the flow of water was controlled, and recently the casing of the well was taken out. There is no longer any flow of either gas or water. The ground has caved in about the well, and some of the people in that neighborhood are [illegible]
